In connection with an agreement, whereby A undertook to employ his works in spinning on hire for B, it was stipulated that A should be bound, if required, to grant his acceptances to B for a sum not exceeding three-fourths of the market value of the raw material and yarns held by him on account of B, and that he should be entitled to a right of lien or retention of goods to a value sufficient to cover such acceptances. It was also specially provided that all materials and yarns sent to A's works should continue to be the sole property of B, subject only to the lien of A for the advances which he might have made to B, or for debts which in any way B might be resting owing to him. Both A and B became bankrupt while bills to a large amount were in the circle in the hands of an onerous holder. At the date of his bankruptcy A held in his hands certain material and yarns belonging to B.

In a competition for the proceeds of these goods between A's trustee, B's trustee, and the billholder, held (1) that A's right under the above agreement was strictly that of pledgee, viz., to hold the goods in his hands at the time till relieved of his obligations under the bills, and to indemnify himself out of the proceeds for any payments which he might be required to make in respect of his acceptances, and that A's trustee was entitled to work out this indemnity in exactly the same way as A would himself have done had he remained solvent; (2) that the English rule of ex parte Waring whereby in similar circumstances the billholder is entitled to have the security subject applied directly in or towards payment of the bills, and to rank on the estates both of drawer and acceptor for any balance, had not been and could not be adopted in Scotland, as it was inconsistent with the rules and principles of the bankruptcy law of Scotland, and as, while conferring a gratuitous benefit on the billholder to which he had right neither by law nor contract, it would inflict injustice on the creditors of the acceptor by violating, to their prejudice, the agreement under which their debtor held the goods; and (3) that B's trustee was not entitled, in virtue of the title he acquired to B's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to have the goods delivered over to him subject to all claims against them to be established in the sequestration, but that the security being a real security by way of pledge, A's trustee was entitled to retain them until the object of the pledge was fulfilled.

No. 149.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

1st Division.
Lord Rutherford Clark.
B.

ON 22d April 1870 a minute of agreement was entered into between James Ramsay junior, merchant, Dundee, and David Hogg Saunders, sole partner of George Saunders & Sons, millspinners, Westfield Works, Blairgowrie, whereby Saunders agreed to employ his whole machinery in spinning on hire for Ramsay on certain terms, and Ramsay undertook to supply material sufficient to keep Saunders' machinery fully employed. The agreement was to endure for ten years, and was truly of the nature of a joint adventure, both parties, while retaining a distinct and independent position, being interested in the surplus profits. A supplementary agreement was subsequently entered into on 25th June 1872 making certain modifications on the original agreement. These two agreements contained stipulations whereby, on the one hand, Ramsay was to give the use of his name to Saunders by way of accommodation to enable him to extend his works, and, on the other, Saunders was to accommodate Ramsay as he might require to enable him to provide raw material, and, generally, to carry on his part of the business.

In particular, the original agreement provided,—“Eighth, All material and yarns sent to Westfield Works by the said James Ramsay junior shall continue to be the sole property of the said James Ramsay junior, subject only to the lien of the said David Hogg Saunders over said material and yarns for the heckling or spinning of the same, or for the advances which he may have made to the said James Ramsay junior, or for debts which in any way the said James Ramsay junior may be resting owing to the said David Hogg Saunders. Ninth, The said David Hogg Saunders shall be bound, if required by the said James Ramsay junior, to grant his own acceptances, or the acceptances of Messrs G. Saunders & Sons, in the said James Ramsay junior's option, for a sum not exceeding three-fourths of the market value of the raw material and yarns held by him on account of the said James Ramsay junior at Westfield Works, and whether he shall grant his own acceptances or the acceptances of the said G. Saunders & Sons he shall be entitled to a right of lien or retention of goods to a value sufficient to cover such acceptances.”

Ramsay and Saunders continued to carry on business under these agreements till the close of 1878, when both became insolvent.

Saunders and his firm of George Saunders & Sons stopped payment on 28th November 1878, and on 10th December 1878 granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors in favour of John Rhind, merchant, Dundee, and John Panton, banker, Blairgowrie. It was a condition of this trust-deed that the trustees should liquidate the estate as if sequestration had been awarded, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was, so far as necessary, held as incorporated in the trust-deed.

Ramsay was sequestrated on 23d December 1878, and David Myles, accountant, Dundee, was appointed his trustee.

Ramsay had from time to time drawn bills upon Saunders and his firm of George Saunders & Sons against yarns and raw material in Saunders' hands in terms of article 9 of the original agreement. These bills were discounted by the Royal Bank of Scotland, and at the date of Ramsay's bankruptcy amounted to the sum of £16,000. Saunders, and his firm of George Saunders & Sons, also drew bills upon Ramsay, which were discounted from time to time with the Commercial Bank of Scotland, and at the date of Saunders' bankruptcy amounted to £10,637, 10s. 8d. These latter bills originated under the agreement in accommodations to enable Saunders to extend his works, but were kept up and increased without apparent reference to any particular purpose.

At the date of Ramsay's sequestration Saunders held goods belonging to Ramsay as cover for his £16,000 of acceptances. Claims having been made to these goods by the Royal Bank, the Commercial Bank, Saunders' trustees, and Ramsay's trustee, they were, by arrangement of parties interested, sold. Owing to depression of trade, forced sale, and other causes, the goods, which were valued in Ramsay's and Saunders' books at £13,000, only realised £4052, 14s. 2d., which sum was deposited with the Royal Bank of Scotland, who then raised this multiplepounding to determine the rights of parties.

I. The Royal Bank of Scotland claimed the whole fund in medio. The grounds of their claim, as disclosed in their pleas, were, "(1) The goods in question having, by agreement between the drawer and acceptors, been specially appropriated to the retirement of the bills in question, and both drawer and acceptors having become insolvent, the claimants, as holders of the said bills, are entitled to have the said goods applied towards payment of the said bills. (2) The goods in question having been specially appropriated to the retirement of the bills in question by agreement among all concerned, including the claimants, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio in terms of their claim."

The first of these pleas was intended to raise the point whether the English rule of ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, which the bank represented as having been long followed in practice in Scotland, ought to be recognised as part of the law of Scotland.

In support of their second plea they stated,—(Cond. 2) "The bills, to the amount of £16,000, discounted by the claimants, were so discounted in the belief, founded on the statements both by the drawer and acceptors, that said bills were accepted against stock or other material in the hands of the acceptors belonging to the drawer, and over which the acceptors had and could exercise a lien for all their acceptances to the drawer. In point of fact, it was understood and agreed among all concerned, viz., (1) the drawer, (2) the acceptors, and (3) the claimants as indorsees of the said bills, that the said stock and other materials in the hands of the acceptors should be specially appropriated to providing for the retirement of the said bills, and held by the acceptors primarily in trust for that purpose."

A proof was allowed to the bank of these averments, but the bank admittedly failed to establish them.

II. The Commercial Bank also claimed the whole fund in medio, but as their claim was, after proof, rejected by the Lord Ordinary, and not insisted on in the Inner-House, it need not be farther mentioned.

III. David Myles (Ramsay's trustee) claimed the whole fund in medio, on the ground of the following plea:—"The fund in medio being the proceeds of a sale, after deducting all charges and expenses of manufacture and otherwise, of property belonging to the said James Ramsay, the claimant, as trustee on his sequestrated estate, is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim."

IV. Messrs Rhind and Panton (Saunders' trustees) "as representing David Hogg Saunders and his firm of George Saunders & Sons, claimed to be ranked and preferred primo loco on the fund in medio in relief of their obligation to the Royal Bank of Scotland as acceptors of the said £16,000 of bills drawn by James Ramsay junior and accepted by George Saunders & Sons or David Hogg Saunders, and held by the said bank, in which bills the said James Ramsay junior was the true debtor, and to

No. 149.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

No. 149. have the whole of the said fund in medio set aside until the amount of dividend to be paid by them to the said Royal Bank of Scotland in respect of the said bills be ascertained.”

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

They pleaded ;—“The said James Ramsay junior being the true debtor upon the said £16,000 of bills drawn by him, and accepted by David Hogg Saunders, or his firm of George Saunders & Sons, and discounted with the Royal Bank of Scotland, the lien which the said David Hogg Saunders held over the goods, for which the fund in medio is the surrogatum, under the 8th and 9th heads of the above-mentioned original agreement of 1870, and at common law, is effectual to the claimants, and entitles them to operate their relief by means thereof of all payments made by them in respect of the said £16,000 of bills.”

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th January 1881, pronounced this interlocutor :—“Repels the claim for the Royal Bank, the claim for the Commercial Bank, and the claim for David Myles : Finds that the yarns mentioned in the record were pledged with Saunders & Sons as a security for the obligations undertaken by them as acceptors of the bills held by the Royal Bank : Finds that the claimants, Rhind and Panton, are entitled to the fund in medio, in order that they may apply it in operating their relief from the said obligations, but subject to the declaration that the balance, if any, is payable to the claimant Myles : Therefore ranks and prefers the claimants Rhind and Panton to the fund in medio, and decerns : Finds them entitled to expenses ; allows an account thereof to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report.”*

* “NOTE.—Ramsay drew bills on Saunders & Sons against yarns belonging to him which had been sent to them to be spun. These bills are now in the hands of the Royal Bank.

“Ramsay and Saunders & Sons have become bankrupt. The estates of the former have been sequestrated. The estates of the latter are being wound up under a private trust.

“The yarns against which the bills were drawn, or at least over which a security is said to have been constituted, were sold, and the proceeds form the fund in medio.

“1. The Royal Bank at first contended that it held a security over the yarns. But it has yielded this point, and relies exclusively on the English law of Waring, 19 Vesey, 345, as giving it a right to be ranked preferably on the fund.

“Though holding no security over the yarns, it maintains that it has a right to the fund, springing out of the equitable rights subsisting between the estates of the drawer and acceptors of the bills held by it. It says that the acceptors are entitled to hold the security as an indemnity against the liability which they have incurred by accepting the bills ; that it is the interest of the acceptors, other creditors that the security should be applied in extinction of the bills ; that it is likewise the interest of the creditors of the drawer that the security should thus be dealt with, and that, as the drawer cannot recover the security from the acceptors without relieving them of the obligations undertaken on the bills, he has no interest or title to object to this application of the security. The result is, to use the language of a commentator on the case of Waring—‘The billholder gets an apparently gratuitous preference, merely because the Court, in administering the two insolvent estates, can, by this means alone, secure the interests of their respective creditors.’—Eddis, p. 7.

“It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the case of the Royal Bank is within the rule laid down in Waring. But he has grave doubts whether it is possible for him to give effect to this rule. It has existed in England for nearly seventy years, but no Scottish authority has been referred to in which it has been recognised or even mentioned. In these circumstances it cannot be said to have been adopted as a part of the law of Scotland.

“But, further, the Lord Ordinary thinks that he cannot give effect to the plea

The Royal Bank of Scotland reclaimed, and argued;—The rule of *ex parte Waring*¹ had been established in England for more than sixty years. It was laid down by Lord Chancellor Eldon in 1815, and had been anxiously reconsidered in a long series of cases since that date by Judges of the greatest eminence, both in the Courts at Westminster Hall and in the House of Lords, with the result of confirming the principle and extending its operation. In a matter of mercantile law it would be a grave

No. 149.
June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

of the Royal Bank in this action. The bank has no right in or over the yarns. The yarns belong to the estate of Ramsay, subject to whatever security has been created over them in favour of Saunders & Sons. In consequence, the bank has only a claim for a ranking, and if it has any preferable claim it must make it good in the sequestration or in the trust, if it is an acceding creditor, or by the use of diligence if it is not. There is no more well ascertained rule in bankruptcy than that the trustee ingathers the estate for division among the creditors according to their rights, and that any claim to a preference must be made in the sequestration or in the trust. To give effect to the claim of the bank would be a violation of this rule. It may be that the bank can establish the preference which it claims, but not the less is its claim in this action ill-founded.

"2. The claim of the Commercial Bank is founded on the same considerations as that of the Royal Bank. But, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, it fails on the facts.

"3. There remains the claim of the trustees for Saunders & Sons, and the claim for Ramsay's trustee. The latter admits that the former hold a security over the yarns to a certain extent, or, in other words, that they were held in pledge by Saunders & Sons as against their liability, on part, at least, of the bills in the hands of the Royal Bank. But he maintains that he is entitled to the fund because the yarns belonged to Ramsay, and because any preference arising under the pledge must be made good in the sequestration.

"It is no doubt settled that any money attached by arrestment must be paid to the trustee in bankruptcy, subject to any preference created by the arrestment. And it has been held that when a law-agent has a hypothec over the title-deeds of the bankrupt, he must give up the deeds and claim his preference in the sequestration. See Johnstone, 2 S. 133; Paul, 4 S. 424; Skinner, 3 Macph. 867. It has thence been argued that the Court has recognised the right of the trustee to ingather the whole estate of the bankrupt, so that the security holder can never himself realise his security, but must make his claim in the sequestration for a preference.

"The argument goes too far. It is certain that in the case of a heritable security the creditor is entitled to realise it. No doubt there is a statutory power to this effect given by the 112th section of the Act, and but for this power it may be urged that the creditor could not sell. But then the 62d and 65th sections, which are applicable to all classes of security, give a title to the trustee to require a conveyance of the security on payment of the value put on it by the creditor, with 20 per cent added in the case mentioned in the former section. These clauses seem to the Lord Ordinary to be inconsistent with the claim made for Ramsay's trustee. For his argument is that he is entitled to a conveyance or a surrender of the security in all cases, subject only to the preference which the security may create. And this leads the Lord Ordinary to think that the 112th section is to be read, not as creating the right of the creditor, but as a mere recognition of it.

"It appears to him, therefore, that the vesting clause must be construed as giving the estate to the trustee, subject to such real rights as have been created over it, and that where, as here, the creditor has a right of pledge, he cannot be required to surrender the subject of the pledge so long as his debt is unpaid.

"4. The only remaining question is, whether Saunders & Sons' right of security covered the whole bills held by the Royal Bank? The Lord Ordinary thinks that on a fair construction of the agreement of 22d April 1870 this question must be answered in the affirmative."

¹ 19 Ves. 345. See also Eddis on the rule of ex parte Waring, ed. 1876.

No. 149. misfortune if a different rule were to prevail in the sister country. There was nothing special in the law of Scotland with reference to the subject-matter which should make the authority of ex parte Waring inapplicable, and as the rule thereby introduced had long been recognised in mercantile practice in Scotland without challenge, it should now receive the sanction of the Court.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

The principle on which the rule of ex parte Waring was founded was that bills having been accepted against goods of the drawer placed in the hands of the acceptor, the drawer could not recover his goods without paying the bills and clearing the acceptor of all liability under them, and the acceptor could make no demand against the drawer without first applying the proceeds of the goods in the discharge pro tanto of the acceptances. On the bankruptcy of both parties, therefore, a deadlock occurred; the drawer could not touch the goods because he could only redeem them on retiring the bills, and that he was unable to do, and the acceptor could not apply the security subjects as part of his estate without making full payment of the bills, and that he was also unable to do. The only way out of the difficulty was that introduced by Lord Eldon, viz., to apply the goods pro tanto in payment of the bills, not out of any favour to the billholder, but from the necessities connected with the administration of the two insolvent estates.

The argument might be summarised in this way (1) the contract between the parties was that the goods should be applied to retire the acceptances; (2) it was beyond the power of either party after bankruptcy to alter the contract; and (3) the rights of the creditors of both being unalterably fixed by bankruptcy, it was impossible to extricate those rights in any other way than by handing over the proceeds of the goods to the billholders. That must be the practical result of carrying out to the letter the contract between the parties.

The most eminent Judges in England, Lord Cranworth in Powles v. Hargreaves,¹ Lord Hatherley in City Bank v. Luckie,² and Lord Cairns in Banner v. Johnston,³ and many others,⁴ had, after deliberate consideration, added the weight of their authority to the rule.

Ramsay's Trustee adopted the argument presented by the bank on the rule of ex parte Waring, and also argued, separatim;—(1) By the letter of the agreement between the parties Saunders was only to accept to the value of three-fourths of the goods in his hands; that, therefore, was the limit of the security he held, and if he accepted beyond that he did so at his own risk, and without any security for indemnification. (2) The claim of Saunders' Trustees omitted to notice that Ramsay had accepted £10,600 worth of bills for the accommodation of Saunders. There must, in any view, be a balancing of accounts before Saunders could come on the subject of pledge, and, therefore, as there were £16,000 of bills accepted by Saunders and £10,600 by Ramsay, it followed that all Saunders' Trustees could claim was to be recouped the dividend they paid in respect of the difference of £5400.⁵ Ramsay, notwithstanding that the goods were in Saunders' hands under the agreement, remained the radical owner. The

¹ 3 D. M. and G., 430, and 23 L. J. Chan. 1.

² L. R. 5 Ch. App. 773.

³ L. R. 5 E. and I. App. 174.

⁴ Bank of Ireland v. Perry, L. R. 7 Exch. 14; in re Barned's Banking Co., L. R. 19 Eq. 1, and 10 Ch. App. 198, and contrast ex parte Copeland, 3 Dea. and Ch. 199, where there was privity of contract between the billholder and the parties to the bill.

⁵ Christie v. Keith, June 29, 1838, 16 S. 1224; Anderson v. Mackinnon, March 17, 1876, ante, vol. iii., 608.

Bankruptcy Statute, 1856, sec. 102, vested his whole property in his trustee. The claimant was therefore entitled to have the security subjects or their proceeds handed over to him as trustee that he might administer them in the sequestration. Any creditor claiming a preference on them could only make good his security by claiming in the usual way.¹ A creditor was not entitled under the Bankruptcy Act to realise his own security except in the case of a heritable security, where special power was given under the 112th and following sections; and the fact of this exception being made was proof of the comprehensiveness of the general rule.

Argued for Saunders' Trustees;—(1) The terms of the agreement were the measure of Saunders' obligation, not of his right. If he chose to accept for more than three-fourths the value of the goods in his hands, or chose to part, as was the actual case, with some of the goods after having accepted the bills, that did not affect the extent of his lien. It covered the whole goods in his hands at any one time. (2) The argument of Ramsay's Trustee that the fund in medio was vested in him vi statuti, by his act and warrant, omitted to consider the words in the vesting clause of the statute (the 102d section of the Act of 1856)—“subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration.” The fund in medio was subject to a preferable security by way of pledge. The radical right, or right to the reversion after the pledgee was satisfied, might be vested in the pledgor's trustee, but that was not to take away the pledgee's security, which, by its very conception, consisted in holding the subject of pledge till satisfied, and, if necessary, realising it. The trustee's interpretation of the statute would destroy the value of the security in the very circumstances in which it was most required, whereas the statute expressly saved the security.² (3) There was truly no question of balancing of accounts between Saunders and Ramsay. The argument that Ramsay's acceptances must be deducted from Saunders' acceptances before Saunders could make his lien effectual really assumed a double ranking on Saunders' estate, which was contrary to law, and at the same time ignored the fact that Saunders was secured, while Ramsay was not. But, besides, the question was not before the Court, as it was not raised on record, and had never been suggested in the Outer-House, either before or after the proof.³ (4) If so, the real question was, what, apart from this specialty, was the proper mode of working out the security which Saunders undoubtedly had over these goods. It was admitted by the Royal Bank that they had no right to the goods ex contractu. But they pleaded that by the rule of ex parte Waring the goods must be handed over to them as the only possible way of working out the rights or the equities of the two bankrupt contracting parties. They represented that the double bankruptcy created a deadlock, and that the obstacle could only be removed by the application of the rule ingeniously invented by Lord Eldon. It was as much as admitted that the rule was not founded on any intelligible principle, and was merely a rule of thumb, which cut the assumed knot in a very simple and comparatively equitable way. But the necessity of its application, even on the bank's own shewing, depended

No. 149.
June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

¹ Skinner v. Henderson, June 2, 1865, 3 Macph. 867, 37 Scot. Jur. 449, and cases therein referred to.

² Royal Bank v. Bain, July 6, 1877, ante, vol. iv. 985; Dick's Trustees v. Whyte's Trustees, Jan. 28, 1879, ante, vol. vi., 584.

³ Jamieson v. Forrest, May 25, 1875, ante, vol. ii. 701; Hannay & Sons' Trustee v. Armstrong Brothers & Co., March 22, 1877, ante, vol. iv. (H. L.) 43, L. R. 2 App. Ca. 399.

No. 147. and I think it is hardly contested that if a party carries on in his inhabited dwelling-house a temperance hotel he is liable only at the rate of sixpence. As your Lordship has observed, there is no restriction upon a man who has an inhabited dwelling-house in which he carries on the business of a hotel-keeper as to what kind of other business he should carry on in that dwelling-house. A hotel-keeper may also carry on the business of a horse and carriage hirer, and that would not make him liable for any higher rate than he would otherwise be liable for. If that is the right construction of the statute, what does it matter what other kind of business it is that a party carries on? And if he can carry on a temperance hotel and only be liable at the rate of sixpence, I think that comes very near the case of this hydropathic establishment. It comes more under the category of a temperance hotel than any other; and therefore, on the whole matter, I come to the same conclusion as your Lordship.

LORD MURE.—The words of section 31 are very broad. They expressly provide that any person who shall carry on in the said dwelling-house the business of a hotel-keeper, or an innkeeper, or coffee-house keeper, although not licensed to sell by retail intoxicating liquors, shall be assessed in the sum of sixpence per pound instead of ninepence. It extends to every one who carries on the business of a hotel-keeper, and I confess I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship. I do not see how it is possible to say that what is carried on in this house, according to the admitted facts of this case, is not, in part at all events, the business of a hotel-keeper. People are received and lodged there and fed, and they are charged for that a certain sum. No doubt there are certain specialties. They are said to be treated hydropathically. That is so, but the establishment is not exclusively for that—because it is admitted that people go there who are not so treated. It seems, in fact, to be a kind of temperance hotel, where, besides conforming to the rule of abstaining from alcoholic liquors, the guests are treated hydropathically by means of the water cure, and I cannot see how that puts the case in a different category from that of a hotel-keeper. I cannot see how that can be maintained under the words of section 31, and although there may be some rather absurd rules, as it seems to me, I do not think that they are so inconsistent with the carrying on of the business of a hotel-keeper as to take the case out of the exemption in the 31st section.

LORD SHAND.—Throughout the discussion in this case I thought the question rather attended with difficulty and doubt, but at the same time, having heard the reasons stated by your Lordships, I do not feel that I am in a position to differ from the judgment which your Lordship proposes. If the case had been one in which the building was exclusively devoted to the reception of persons for medical treatment, although an incident of that treatment was that they should be boarded and reside in the house, I should certainly have been of opinion that this was not in any reasonable sense within the meaning of section 31 a carrying on of the business of a hotel-keeper, or an innkeeper, or coffee-house keeper. But it appears there is a large class of persons coming as visitors who do not want medical treatment, but who merely come to a beautiful district to live for a time, as people live in hotels in the country, paying for their rooms and for their board, or for separate meals if they choose to have them. In that respect, undoubtedly, the establishment is substantially

June 14, 1881.
Strathearn
Hydropathic
Company,
Limited, v.
Inland Revenue.

of the same kind as a hotel. The difficulty I have felt in the case has arisen from the two circumstances that I do think the rules leave some power in the hands of those who are managing their business to exclude guests as in their opinion unsuitable, and in addition to that when guests are received they are put under some very remarkable restrictions, which are not, I think, to be found in any hotel in this country. At the same time, I am not disposed to give undue weight to these circumstances. The broad features of the case are, as your Lordship has put it, that people are there living temporarily in a house which is practically open to the public, and they are living there as at a hotel at bed and board, paying hotel charges or what may be represented as hotel charges; and therefore, looking to the whole matter, I do not differ from the judgment which your Lordship proposes.

No. 147.
June 14, 1881.
Strathearn
Hydropathic
Company,
Limited, v.
Inland Revenue.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Being of opinion that the appellants carry on in their establishment the business of a hotel-keeper within the meaning of the 31st section of the statute 34 and 35 Vict. cap. 103, remit to the Commissioners to reduce the assessment appealed against from £36, 7s. 6d. to £24, 5s., and decern."

HENRY & SCOTT, S.S.C.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE.—Agents.

ARCHIBALD POWRIE, Complainer.—D.-F. Kinnear—H. Johnston.
ALBERT LOUIS, Respondent.—Scott—Rhind.

No. 148.

June 15, 1881.
Powrie v.
Louis.

Expenses—Proof—Copies of evidence for debate before Lord Ordinary.—Exceptional circumstances, under which the charge for one copy of the evidence for use of counsel at an adjourned hearing on evidence in the Outer-House was allowed against the losing party.

THIS action was a suspension of a charge on a bill on the ground of forgery.

1st Division.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
B.

The defence was adoption.

Proof was led on 13th and 14th December 1880 before Lord Craighill. The evidence was directed to the proof of what occurred at certain meetings between the parties during the currency of the bill, and to collateral matters bearing on the credibility of the witnesses, upon which the decision of the case mainly turned, as the evidence in chief was contradictory. The proof was, in consequence, led at considerable length, the shorthand writer's notes occupying 150 manuscript pages.

At the close of the proof the Lord Ordinary indicated his opinion that counsel should have an opportunity of considering the proof led before being heard on the evidence, and he accordingly pronounced an order appointing parties to be heard on the proof adduced and whole cause, and intimated that, as he could not give a day for the hearing before the Christmas recess, he would cause the case to be put out on the earliest possible day after the Court met in January.

Owing to the illness of Lord Gifford, Lord Craighill was called on to sit in the Second Division continuously until the retirement of Lord Gifford, when he took his seat there permanently. The present case was then transferred from his Outer-House roll to that of Lord Rutherford Clark, who appointed parties to be heard on the proof on 16th February.

Lord Rutherford Clark decided against the respondent, with expenses, and the First Division refused a reclaiming note against his interlocutor, with additional expenses.

In taxing the complainer's account of expenses, the Auditor struck off

No. 148. the charge for copies of the evidence made for senior and junior counsel for use at the hearing before the Lord Ordinary, intimating that, in his opinion, it was not in his discretion to allow the charge, though he considered the case an exceptional one.

June 15, 1881.
Powrie v.
Louis.

The complainer objected to the Auditor's report in respect of the disallowance of these charges.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the general rule laid down in the case of Birrell v. Beveridge, Feb. 15, 1868, 6 Macph. 421, is a very salutary rule, and must be adhered to. While it was distinctly laid down there, both by my brother Lord Deas and myself, that in the general case the discussion upon the evidence led at a proof ought to take place at once and without postponement, we both intimated that there might and would be exceptional cases in which delay might be for the interest of parties, and conducive to the ends of justice, and where counsel would, therefore, require written or printed copies of the evidence.

As regards the present case, I am not quite sure that its circumstances would have warranted its being considered an exceptional case if counsel had spoken upon the proof within a day or two subsequently to its being led. It does not appear to me that any study of the evidence here would have been likely to lead to a better or more useful discussion. It would have been much more satisfactory if the Lord Ordinary had at once heard the parties. But his Lordship seems to have at once made up his mind that the hearing must stand over till after the Christmas recess. That creates a specialty in this case which, I rather think, ought not to have occurred, but which makes it in some degree a matter of necessity that counsel should be furnished with a copy of the evidence. Counsel cannot be expected to carry in their minds all the details of the evidence in a case like the present for any length of time. In addition, we have also this fact occurring, through no fault of the party, that the Lord Ordinary who decided this case was not the same Lord Ordinary who heard the evidence. It was therefore necessary for counsel to go into the evidence with much more detail and elaboration than would otherwise have been required.

It accordingly appears to me that the lapse of time which took place between the leading of the evidence and the discussion upon it, and the fact that the Judge before whom the discussion took place was not the same Judge who took the proof, make this just such an exceptional case as was contemplated in the opinions which were delivered in Birrell's case. At the same time I do not think that more than one copy of the evidence was required—one counsel only is allowed to be heard, and it should be arranged beforehand which counsel is to take the debate, and he only need be supplied with the copy of evidence. I think, therefore, that the charge for one copy should be allowed.

LORD DEAS.—I see no reason for not adhering to the general rule laid down in the case to which your Lordship has referred. I should not be disposed to think that the mere fact that the case turns mainly upon the credibility of the witnesses makes it an exception to the general rule. There is the greater reason for a case of that kind being heard at once. But the matters referred to by your Lordship as causing the delay in the hearing do appear to introduce a specialty, and I therefore concur.

¹ Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. c. 112), sec. 1; Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 32; Birrell v. Beveridge, Feb. 15, 1868, 6 Macph. 421.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

No. 148.

THE COURT sustained the objection to the extent of allowing the charge for one copy of the evidence.

June 15, 1881.
Powrie v.
Louis.

LEBURN & HENDERSON, S.S.C.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Pursuers and Real Raisers.

No. 149.

THE ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders and Claimants.—Asher—Graham Murray.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Defenders and Claimants.

DAVID MYLES (James Ramsay junior's Trustee), Defender and Claimant.
—R. Johnstone—Macfarlane.

JOHN RHIND AND ANOTHER (George Saunders & Son's Trustees), Defenders and Claimants.—D.-F. Kinnear—H. Johnston.

Bankruptcy—Bills—Lien—Pledge—Bills accepted against goods; bankruptcy of both drawer and acceptor while bills in hands of onerous holder; how goods to be dealt with—English rule of ex parte Waring inapplicable.—When A accepts the drafts of B against B's goods in A's hands, if both A and B fail while the goods are still in A's hands, and the bills are in the circle, (1) the billholder is entitled to claim against the estate of each for the amount of the bill, to the effect of recovering on the whole full payment; (2) A's estate has a lien over the goods to the effect of entire relief and indemnification against any payments which A's estate may be required to make in respect of the bills; and (3) B's estate is entitled to demand the goods after such indemnification has been given out of the proceeds, or on full security being given to relieve A and his estate of the bills.

The English rule of ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, is inconsistent with the rules and principles of the Scotch bankruptcy system, and has not been adopted in Scotland.

In connection with an agreement, whereby A undertook to employ his works in spinning on hire for B, it was stipulated that A should be bound, if required, to grant his acceptances to B for a sum not exceeding three-fourths of the market value of the raw material and yarns held by him on account of B, and that he should be entitled to a right of lien or retention of goods to a value sufficient to cover such acceptances. It was also specially provided that all materials and yarns sent to A's works should continue to be the sole property of B, subject only to the lien of A for the advances which he might have made to B, or for debts which in any way B might be resting owing to him. Both A and B became bankrupt while bills to a large amount were in the circle in the hands of an onerous holder. At the date of his bankruptcy A held in his hands certain material and yarns belonging to B.

In a competition for the proceeds of these goods between A's trustee, B's trustee, and the billholder, held (1) that A's right under the above agreement was strictly that of pledgee, viz., to hold the goods in his hands at the time till relieved of his obligations under the bills, and to indemnify himself out of the proceeds for any payments which he might be required to make in respect of his acceptances, and that A's trustee was entitled to work out this indemnity in exactly the same way as A would himself have done had he remained solvent; (2) that the English rule of ex parte Waring whereby in similar circumstances the billholder is entitled to have the security subject applied directly in or towards payment of the bills, and to rank on the estates both of drawer and acceptor for any balance, had not been and could not be adopted in Scotland, as it was inconsistent with the rules and principles of the bankruptcy law of Scotland, and as, while conferring a gratuitous benefit on the billholder to which he had right neither by law nor contract, it would inflict injustice on the creditors of the acceptor by violating, to their prejudice, the agreement under which their debtor held the goods; and (3) that B's trustee was not entitled, in virtue of the title he acquired to B's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to have the goods delivered over to him subject to all claims against them to be established in the sequestration, but that the security being a real security by way of pledge, A's trustee was entitled to retain them until the object of the pledge was fulfilled.

No. 149.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

1st Division.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
B.

ON 22d April 1870 a minute of agreement was entered into between James Ramsay junior, merchant, Dundee, and David Hogg Saunders, sole partner of George Saunders & Sons, millspinners, Westfield Works, Blairgowrie, whereby Saunders agreed to employ his whole machinery in spinning on hire for Ramsay on certain terms, and Ramsay undertook to supply material sufficient to keep Saunders' machinery fully employed. The agreement was to endure for ten years, and was truly of the nature of a joint adventure, both parties, while retaining a distinct and independent position, being interested in the surplus profits. A supplementary agreement was subsequently entered into on 25th June 1872 making certain modifications on the original agreement. These two agreements contained stipulations whereby, on the one hand, Ramsay was to give the use of his name to Saunders by way of accommodation to enable him to extend his works, and, on the other, Saunders was to accommodate Ramsay as he might require to enable him to provide raw material, and, generally, to carry on his part of the business.

In particular, the original agreement provided,—“Eighth, All material and yarns sent to Westfield Works by the said James Ramsay junior shall continue to be the sole property of the said James Ramsay junior, subject only to the lien of the said David Hogg Saunders over said material and yarns for the heckling or spinning of the same, or for the advances which he may have made to the said James Ramsay junior, or for debts which in any way the said James Ramsay junior may be resting owing to the said David Hogg Saunders. Ninth, The said David Hogg Saunders shall be bound, if required by the said James Ramsay junior, to grant his own acceptances, or the acceptances of Messrs G. Saunders & Sons, in the said James Ramsay junior's option, for a sum not exceeding three-fourths of the market value of the raw material and yarns held by him on account of the said James Ramsay junior at Westfield Works, and whether he shall grant his own acceptances or the acceptances of the said G. Saunders & Sons he shall be entitled to a right of lien or retention of goods to a value sufficient to cover such acceptances.”

Ramsay and Saunders continued to carry on business under these agreements till the close of 1878, when both became insolvent.

Saunders and his firm of George Saunders & Sons stopped payment on 28th November 1878, and on 10th December 1878 granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors in favour of John Rhind, merchant, Dundee, and John Panton, banker, Blairgowrie. It was a condition of this trust-deed that the trustees should liquidate the estate as if sequestration had been awarded, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was, so far as necessary, held as incorporated in the trust-deed.

Ramsay was sequestered on 23d December 1878, and David Myles, accountant, Dundee, was appointed his trustee.

Ramsay had from time to time drawn bills upon Saunders and his firm of George Saunders & Sons against yarns and raw material in Saunders' hands in terms of article 9 of the original agreement. These bills were discounted by the Royal Bank of Scotland, and at the date of Ramsay's bankruptcy amounted to the sum of £16,000. Saunders, and his firm of George Saunders & Sons, also drew bills upon Ramsay, which were discounted from time to time with the Commercial Bank of Scotland, and at the date of Saunders' bankruptcy amounted to £10,637, 10s. 8d. These latter bills originated under the agreement in accommodations to enable Saunders to extend his works, but were kept up and increased without apparent reference to any particular purpose.

At the date of Ramsay's sequestration Saunders held goods belonging to Ramsay as cover for his £16,000 of acceptances. Claims having been made to these goods by the Royal Bank, the Commercial Bank, Saunders' trustees, and Ramsay's trustee, they were, by arrangement of parties interested, sold. Owing to depression of trade, forced sale, and other causes, the goods, which were valued in Ramsay's and Saunders' books at £13,000, only realised £4052, 14s. 2d., which sum was deposited with the Royal Bank of Scotland, who then raised this multiplepinding to determine the rights of parties.

I. The Royal Bank of Scotland claimed the whole fund in medio. The grounds of their claim, as disclosed in their pleas, were, "(1) The goods in question having, by agreement between the drawer and acceptors, been specially appropriated to the retirement of the bills in question, and both drawer and acceptors having become insolvent, the claimants, as holders of the said bills, are entitled to have the said goods applied towards payment of the said bills. (2) The goods in question having been specially appropriated to the retirement of the bills in question by agreement among all concerned, including the claimants, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio in terms of their claim."

The first of these pleas was intended to raise the point whether the English rule of ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, which the bank represented as having been long followed in practice in Scotland, ought to be recognised as part of the law of Scotland.

In support of their second plea they stated,—(Cond. 2) "The bills, to the amount of £16,000, discounted by the claimants, were so discounted in the belief, founded on the statements both by the drawer and acceptors, that said bills were accepted against stock or other material in the hands of the acceptors belonging to the drawer, and over which the acceptors had and could exercise a lien for all their acceptances to the drawer. In point of fact, it was understood and agreed among all concerned, viz., (1) the drawer, (2) the acceptors, and (3) the claimants as indorsees of the said bills, that the said stock and other materials in the hands of the acceptors should be specially appropriated to providing for the retirement of the said bills, and held by the acceptors primarily in trust for that purpose."

A proof was allowed to the bank of these averments, but the bank admittedly failed to establish them.

II. The Commercial Bank also claimed the whole fund in medio, but as their claim was, after proof, rejected by the Lord Ordinary, and not insisted on in the Inner-House, it need not be farther mentioned.

III. David Myles (Ramsay's trustee) claimed the whole fund in medio, on the ground of the following plea:—"The fund in medio being the proceeds of a sale, after deducting all charges and expenses of manufacture and otherwise, of property belonging to the said James Ramsay, the claimant, as trustee on his sequestrated estate, is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim."

IV. Messrs Rhind and Panton (Saunders' trustees) "as representing David Hogg Saunders and his firm of George Saunders & Sons, claimed to be ranked and preferred primo loco on the fund in medio in relief of their obligation to the Royal Bank of Scotland as acceptors of the said £16,000 of bills drawn by James Ramsay junior and accepted by George Saunders & Sons or David Hogg Saunders, and held by the said bank, in which bills the said James Ramsay junior was the true debtor, and to

No. 149.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scotland, &c.

No. 149.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

have the whole of the said fund in medio set aside until the amount of dividend to be paid by them to the said Royal Bank of Scotland in respect of the said bills be ascertained."

They pleaded ;—"The said James Ramsay junior being the true debtor upon the said £16,000 of bills drawn by him, and accepted by David Hogg Saunders, or his firm of George Saunders & Sons, and discounted with the Royal Bank of Scotland, the lien which the said David Hogg Saunders held over the goods, for which the fund in medio is the surrogatum, under the 8th and 9th heads of the above-mentioned original agreement of 1870, and at common law, is effectual to the claimants, and entitles them to operate their relief by means thereof of all payments made by them in respect of the said £16,000 of bills."

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th January 1881, pronounced this interlocutor :—"Repels the claim for the Royal Bank, the claim for the Commercial Bank, and the claim for David Myles : Finds that the yarns mentioned in the record were pledged with Saunders & Sons as a security for the obligations undertaken by them as acceptors of the bills held by the Royal Bank : Finds that the claimants, Rhind and Panton, are entitled to the fund in medio, in order that they may apply it in operating their relief from the said obligations, but subject to the declaration that the balance, if any, is payable to the claimant Myles : Therefore ranks and prefers the claimants Rhind and Panton to the fund in medio, and decerns : Finds them entitled to expenses ; allows an account thereof to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report."*

* "NOTE.—Ramsay drew bills on Saunders & Sons against yarns belonging to him which had been sent to them to be spun. These bills are now in the hands of the Royal Bank.

"Ramsay and Saunders & Sons have become bankrupt. The estates of the former have been sequestered. The estates of the latter are being wound up under a private trust.

"The yarns against which the bills were drawn, or at least over which a security is said to have been constituted, were sold, and the proceeds form the fund in medio.

"1. The Royal Bank at first contended that it held a security over the yarns. But it has yielded this point, and relies exclusively on the English law of Waring, 19 Vesey, 345, as giving it a right to be ranked preferably on the fund.

"Though holding no security over the yarns, it maintains that it has a right to the fund, springing out of the equitable rights subsisting between the estates of the drawer and acceptors of the bills held by it. It says that the acceptors are entitled to hold the security as an indemnity against the liability which they have incurred by accepting the bills ; that it is the interest of the acceptors' other creditors that the security should be applied in extinction of the bills ; that it is likewise the interest of the creditors of the drawer that the security should thus be dealt with, and that, as the drawer cannot recover the security from the acceptors without relieving them of the obligations undertaken on the bills, he has no interest or title to object to this application of the security. The result is, to use the language of a commentator on the case of Waring—'The billholder gets an apparently gratuitous preference, merely because the Court, in administering the two insolvent estates, can, by this means alone, secure the interests of their respective creditors.'—Eddis, p. 7.

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the case of the Royal Bank is within the rule laid down in Waring. But he has grave doubts whether it is possible for him to give effect to this rule. It has existed in England for nearly seventy years, but no Scottish authority has been referred to in which it has been recognised or even mentioned. In these circumstances it cannot be said to have been adopted as a part of the law of Scotland.

"But, further, the Lord Ordinary thinks that he cannot give effect to the plea

The Royal Bank of Scotland reclaimed, and argued;—The rule of *ex parte Waring*¹ had been established in England for more than sixty years. It was laid down by Lord Chancellor Eldon in 1815, and had been anxiously reconsidered in a long series of cases since that date by Judges of the greatest eminence, both in the Courts at Westminster Hall and in the House of Lords, with the result of confirming the principle and extending its operation. In a matter of mercantile law it would be a grave

No. 149.
June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

of the Royal Bank in this action. The bank has no right in or over the yarns. The yarns belong to the estate of Ramsay, subject to whatever security has been created over them in favour of Saunders & Sons. In consequence, the bank has only a claim for a ranking, and if it has any preferable claim it must make it good in the sequestration or in the trust, if it is an acceding creditor, or by the use of diligence if it is not. There is no more well ascertained rule in bankruptcy than that the trustee ingathers the estate for division among the creditors according to their rights, and that any claim to a preference must be made in the sequestration or in the trust. To give effect to the claim of the bank would be a violation of this rule. It may be that the bank can establish the preference which it claims, but not the less is its claim in this action ill-founded.

"2. The claim of the Commercial Bank is founded on the same considerations as that of the Royal Bank. But, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, it fails on the facts.

"3. There remains the claim of the trustees for Saunders & Sons, and the claim for Ramsay's trustee. The latter admits that the former hold a security over the yarns to a certain extent, or, in other words, that they were held in pledge by Saunders & Sons as against their liability, on part, at least, of the bills in the hands of the Royal Bank. But he maintains that he is entitled to the fund because the yarns belonged to Ramsay, and because any preference arising under the pledge must be made good in the sequestration.

"It is no doubt settled that any money attached by arrestment must be paid to the trustee in bankruptcy, subject to any preference created by the arrestment. And it has been held that when a law-agent has a hypothec over the title-deeds of the bankrupt, he must give up the deeds and claim his preference in the sequestration. See Johnstone, 2 S. 133; Paul, 4 S. 424; Skinner, 3 Macph. 867. It has thence been argued that the Court has recognised the right of the trustee to ingather the whole estate of the bankrupt, so that the security holder can never himself realise his security, but must make his claim in the sequestration for a preference.

"The argument goes too far. It is certain that in the case of a heritable security the creditor is entitled to realise it. No doubt there is a statutory power to this effect given by the 112th section of the Act, and but for this power it may be urged that the creditor could not sell. But then the 62d and 65th sections, which are applicable to all classes of security, give a title to the trustee to require a conveyance of the security on payment of the value put on it by the creditor, with 20 per cent added in the case mentioned in the former section. These clauses seem to the Lord Ordinary to be inconsistent with the claim made for Ramsay's trustee. For his argument is that he is entitled to a conveyance or a surrender of the security in all cases, subject only to the preference which the security may create. And this leads the Lord Ordinary to think that the 112th section is to be read, not as creating the right of the creditor, but as a mere recognition of it.

"It appears to him, therefore, that the vesting clause must be construed as giving the estate to the trustee, subject to such real rights as have been created over it, and that where, as here, the creditor has a right of pledge, he cannot be required to surrender the subject of the pledge so long as his debt is unpaid.

"4. The only remaining question is, whether Saunders & Sons' right of security covered the whole bills held by the Royal Bank? The Lord Ordinary thinks that on a fair construction of the agreement of 22d April 1870 this question must be answered in the affirmative."

¹ 19 Ves. 345. See also Eddis on the rule of ex parte Waring, ed. 1876.

No. 149. wholly or in great part against goods placed in the hands of the acceptors as a security for their acceptances.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

In these circumstances, it is not possible to maintain successfully that the bank has any title or right to ask that the goods held by Saunders & Sons, or the proceeds, shall be handed over to them in extinction pro tanto of the bill debt due to them. It has never been said, so far I am aware, that in such circumstances the bank can plead any equity giving them such a right or claim. To give such a right to the bank would simply be to give them the right to a security for which they never stipulated, and this, carrying out the same principle, might even be carried the length of giving them the right to a security of the existence of which they were entirely ignorant. Accordingly Lord Eldon, in ex parte Waring, observed that "if these billholders are to have payment in preference to the other creditors, it must be by the effect of an equity between those two houses" (i.e., between the drawers and acceptors) "rather than by any demand directly in their own right." While in the case of Banner v. Johnston, L. R. 5 E. & L. Appeals, 174, Lord Cairns observed,—“It has always been most carefully said that the right of the billholder under ex parte Waring is not a right founded on contract; it does not spring out of the contract; but it springs out of the necessities connected with the administration of the two insolvent estates.”

If, then, the bank is to obtain the direct benefit of the goods, or proceeds of the goods, in question, it is not because they have any legal right or claim to it. They would obtain a resulting benefit entirely because, in the settlement of accounts between the two insolvent estates, the interests of the creditors on these estates respectively would be thereby secured. If the trustees on these respective estates, in the interests of the creditors whom they severally represent, should arrange to dispose of the proceeds of the goods between themselves in a way satisfactory to them in the fair discharge of their respective duties, it follows that the bank could not maintain any such direct claim to the proceeds of the goods as they here assert.

The question remains, are they entitled to the resulting benefit asked, because the trustee on the estate of Ramsay, the owner of the goods, demands that the proceeds of the goods should be applied at once to the part-payment of the bill debt, so as to reduce the ranking on Ramsay's estate?

The answer to that question seems to me to depend entirely on the terms of the agreement on which the goods were placed in the hands of Saunders & Sons, and I think there is no difficulty in determining what these terms were. The acceptances of Saunders and his firm were given on the agreement that they should hold the goods in hand at any time as a security in relief of their obligations, or, in other words, to indemnify them for any payments they might be required to make in respect of their acceptances. Although they became acceptors of the bills it was quite understood and agreed, in a question between them and Ramsay, that Ramsay, the true debtor, should retire the bills at maturity, and in point of fact he did retire them till his bankruptcy occurred, when the bills then in the circle were dishonoured. The case is not one in which goods were put into the hands of the acceptor of a bill on the agreement that as he was to pay the bill at maturity he should in the meantime sell the goods and apply the proceeds to the purpose of meeting the bill. According to the agreement, it was not contemplated that the acceptors should have any payment to make, but if through the default of Ramsay, the drawer, Saunders & to have recourse to their security for reimbursement.

Sons, the acceptors, had to make such payment, then they were to be entitled No. 149.

This being the agreement of the parties, there can, I think, be no doubt as to what are their respective rights, or rather as to what are the respective rights of their creditors according to the law of Scotland in the circumstances that have occurred. These rights are clearly stated in the passage from Bell's Commentaries which your Lordship has quoted (i. p. 294), and the same view is expressed in a subsequent part of his work, volume ii. p. 532.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

In the first place, in a question between both parties and the bank, they must equally submit to a ranking for the full amount of the bills, for the simple reason that they have each granted a personal obligation, the one as drawer and the other as acceptor for that amount. When, however, the bank obtains a ranking on each estate, it receives all that was stipulated for as the consideration of discounting the bills, viz., the full effect of the personal obligation of each of the parties. The drawer, the owner of the goods, can have no good reason for complaint against a ranking to the full extent, for he not only drew the bills for his own behoof, but actually received the money for them for which the bank ranks. The acceptors must submit to a ranking, because ex facie of the bills they are the primary obligants for their contents.

Again, as regards the acceptors, the goods they hold are not their property, and the trustees for their creditors are no more entitled to throw them into their general estate than they themselves were entitled to do so. They must keep the goods, in terms of the agreement on which they were obtained, as a security merely to indemnify the estate against such loss as may arise to it from the non-payment of the bills and the consequent ranking of the bank, but it seems to me to be clear that they are entitled to keep the goods and apply the proceeds to the last farthing, in so far as necessary to recoup every payment of a dividend made to the bank. When no farther payment can be demanded they are bound to restore to the owner the remainder of the goods, or of the proceeds in their hands. There is, I conceive, no difficulty in carrying this out practically in the way described by your Lordship, and shewn in the illustrative states used on behalf of the trustees on Saunders & Sons' estate in the course of the argument. Though in this way and in these states, for the purpose of clearness, it is shewn that after the payment of each of several dividends on the estate of Saunders & Sons, paid out of their own proper funds or estate, recourse is had to the proceeds of the security in order to recoup or reimburse the estate to the extent of the dividends paid to the bank, I do not doubt that a formula could be supplied by an accountant which would simplify the process so as to admit of the sum to be drawn from the proceeds of the goods being ascertained at once, or, at all events, finally on the payment of a second dividend. It will be observed that in this way the creditors on the estate of Saunders & Sons get no benefit from the goods beyond the security for which their debtor stipulated, and to which he was entitled under his agreement with the owner of the goods. No part of the proceeds is taken possession of and distributed by them as part of the general estate of their debtors liable for their debts. What really occurs is this, that they are relieved of the effects of the bank's ranking in carrying off part of the general estate; for to the extent of the ranking the security is made available. And it is so made available, not by the operation of any special rule in bankruptcy, but simply and solely in carrying out to the letter and in the spirit

No. 149. the agreement under which their debtor got possession of a security or indemnity fund.

June 15, 1881.

Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

It follows that, as regards the owner of the goods, or his creditors in bankruptcy in his place, their only claim is for the balance of the proceeds of the goods remaining after the security has served its purpose of indemnifying the estate which held the goods in security. It is conceded that the owner or his creditors could only demand the delivery of the goods on securing total relief from the obligations in respect of which they were given over. The concession seems to me to lead directly to the inference that till such relief is obtained the security-holder cannot be required to part with the goods to the billholder or any one else.

The trustee on Ramsay's estate claims that, in order to give effect to a rule of equity, the proceeds of the goods should be wholly paid over to the bank in diminution of their ranking on both estates. The answer to the proposal is, in my opinion, conclusive, that in asking this to be done the creditors of Saunders & Sons, who are precluded from ranking on the estate of Ramsay because of the rule against double ranking, are required to forego, to a great extent, the benefit of the agreement under which their debtors acquired the goods, viz., as an indemnity to them against all loss they might sustain through their being called on to pay the debt truly due by Ramsay; and I confess I am therefore unable to appreciate the reasoning which can justify this demand on any principle of equity.

I observe that in the case in re Barned's Banking Company, ex parte Joint Stock Discount Company (1875), L. R., 10 Ch. App. 200, the billholders went so far as to maintain that they should not even deduct the proceeds of securities of which they had got the benefit under the rule of ex parte Waring, but should be entitled to rank for their full debt without such deduction, but the opinion of the Master of the Rolls to a contrary effect was affirmed. That opinion was thus expressed:—"If I apply ex parte Waring for the benefit of the billholder, the billholder must take it with the limitation, and under the conditions, expressed in the order in ex parte Waring, that is to say, the security is to be considered as having been applied in the first instance. I have no disposition myself to give a billholder any further benefit than that he has already obtained under it." In that case Lord Justice Mellish observed—"I am entirely of the same opinion. It appears to me that if any other rule prevailed, we should be taking away from the persons who really owned the security the value of it. As it is, they only get it very imperfectly, but still to a certain extent they do get it, by the diminution of the sum which may be proved against the estate. If it were not to be diminished it might wholly, in some cases, be given to the billholder, and taken away from them altogether."

The opinion of this very learned Judge evidently was, that the effect of the rule ex parte Waring in that case was to give the security-holder a very imperfect benefit from his security. That would certainly be the result of applying the rule in this case, and I can see no good reason either in law or equity for giving the holders of the security an imperfect or partial right only to the benefit of the security, when the agreement of the parties was that they should have the benefit of the security to its full value.

There were three other matters upon which argument was offered, and upon each of which I desire to say a single word.

In the first place, it was maintained that, whatever right in security Saunders & Sons had over these goods, they were bound to deliver over the goods to the trustee on Ramsay's estate, because Ramsay was the owner of that estate, and his trustee was, under the Bankrupt Statute, vested with the right of the whole creditors of that estate, wherever situated. I agree with the Lord Ordinary thinking that although, no doubt, the trustee, by virtue of the title he acquired under the Bankrupt Statute, is in the general case entitled to ingather the whole of the bankrupt's property, the right conferred on him is subject to such securities as existed on that estate, and where there is a real security such as we have here—for, in point of fact, these goods are a real security pledged to a creditor who has made advances or undertaken an obligation on the security of that pledge—I cannot read the statute as entitling the trustee to take away that pledge, by the delivery of which the creditor has been secured in his advance.

No. 149.
June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank of Scotland v. Commercial Bank of Scotland, &c.

In the next place, it was maintained that Saunders & Sons in this case were not entitled to hold the goods in question for so large a sum as the amount of the acceptances for which they were pledged in terms of the agreement under which the advance was made, and that they were only entitled to retain goods to the extent of three-fourths of the market value under the agreement. It appears to me that the Lord Ordinary is clearly right in the view he takes of articles 8 and 9 of this agreement, that it was stipulated that whatever obligation Saunders & Sons undertook should be covered by any goods belonging to Ramsay that were to be in their hands.

A third point was also made the subject of argument on behalf of Ramsay's trustee, arising in this way:—It was said that although Saunders & Sons had accepted bills, which I may call accommodation bills, in favour of Ramsay, to the extent of £16,000, yet, on the other hand, it appears upon the proof that Ramsay had accepted accommodation bills in favour of Saunders & Sons to the amount of £10,600, and that on that account the trustee on Saunders & Sons' estate should only be held entitled to retain goods of the value of the difference between these two sums,—that goods should not be retained to the full value of £16,000, because Saunders & Sons had themselves obtained accommodation bills to the extent of £10,600. I refrain from expressing any opinion on this point, because I do not think it is raised under this action. The Commercial Bank bills for £10,600 were expressly mentioned in the condescendence of the fund in medio, article 6th; but, if we turn to the claim which is made on behalf of Mr Myles, Ramsay's trustee, I find the claimant adopts articles 1 to 4 inclusive, and also article 9 of the condescendence annexed to the summons, expressly, and I must assume designedly, omitting all reference to the 6th article of the condescendence of the fund in medio, which is the only article which throws light on the matter at all; and turning, again, to the pleas of Mr Myles, I find no indication of any point being intended to be raised in regard to it. It is therefore needless to propose that the Court should give this point or question—which was neither raised in the record nor alluded to in the proof, and as to which a good deal of light is required and might have been shed—any consideration at all. And upon that ground, while I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to, I expressly refrain from stating any opinion on this third point.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the Royal Bank of Scotland against Lord Rutherford Clark's interlocutor of 20th January 1881, adhere to

No. 149.

June 15, 1881.
Royal Bank
of Scotland v.
Commercial
Bank of Scot-
land, &c.

the interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the claimants Rhind and Panton entitled to additional expenses, but under the declaration that the claimants, Royal Bank and Commercial Bank, are to be liable in the expenses of the proof; and remit to the Auditor to tax the amount of expenses, and to report."

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—MELVILLE & LINDERAY, W.S.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—
MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 150.

June 22, 1881.
Tennents v.
Romanes.

JAMES LOGAN, Real Raiser and Pursuer.

MRS HAMILTON DUNBAR TENNENT AND CHARLES WELCH TENNENT, Claimants and Appellants.—Rhind.

CHARLES SIMON ROMANES (Trustee upon William Carmichael's Sequestrated Estate), Claimant and Respondent.—Baxter.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 32.—An interlocutor disposing of the whole merits of an action and awarding expenses was pronounced by a Sheriff-substitute on 10th March and adhered to by the Sheriff on the 31st, the unsuccessful party being found liable in the expenses of the appeal, "to be taxed and decerned for along with the other expenses." The decree was extracted on 21st April. Subsequently, on 2d May, another interlocutor was pronounced, giving decree for the taxed amount of expenses. Against this interlocutor an appeal was taken to the Court of Session, with the view of bringing up the previous interlocutors in the case. Appeal refused, on the grounds (1) that, under the 32d section of the Court of Session Act, 1876, after extract no appeal is competent, and (2) that an interlocutor which merely awards expenses is not subject to review.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

IN a multiplepointing before the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie), upon 10th March 1881, pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds in law that the claimants, Mr and Mrs Tennent, are not entitled to be ranked . . . in terms of their claim; repels said claim, and ranks and prefers the claimant, Charles Simon Romanes, to the whole fund in medio: Grants warrant to the Clerk of Court to pay over to him the consigned money, with all interest thereon: Finds the claimants, Mr and Mrs Tennent, liable to the claimant, Charles Simon Romanes, in expenses: Remits the account to the Auditor to tax and report, and decerns."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Clark), upon 31st March, adhered. He further found Mr and Mrs Tennent liable "in the expenses of this appeal, to be taxed and decerned for along with the other expenses." This interlocutor was extracted upon 21st April 1881, and the consigned money was paid the next day.

Upon 2d May "the Sheriff-substitute, on the craving of the procurator for the claimant, Charles Simon Romanes, approves of the Auditor's report on his account of expenses, and decerns against the claimants, Mrs Hamilton Dunbar Tennent and Charles Welch Tennent, to make payment to the said claimant of the said taxed expenses of process, to which he has been found entitled, besides the dues of extract, and decerns."

On 16th May Mr and Mrs Tennent appealed to the Court of Session.

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The interlocutor of 31st March disposed of the whole merits of the cause, and awarded expenses. It was therefore a "final judgment," which had been extracted in terms of the 32d section of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876,* and could not now be reviewed. It was no answer that the Sheriff had subsequently given decree for expenses. An award of expenses was not appealable.¹ No. 150.

* Quoted in the Lord President's opinion, infra.

The appellants answered, that the interlocutor of 2d May, giving decree for expenses, vitiated the extract, proceedings not being at an end when it was obtained. The appeal against that interlocutor brought all previous interlocutors under review.²

June 22, 1881.
Tennents v.
Romanes.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have no doubt that the Sheriff's judgment of 31st March was a "final judgment" within the meaning of the Acts of Parliament. It was extracted on 21st April, and the consigned money was paid upon the 22d.

The Sheriff-substitute subsequently, upon 2d May, pronounced an interlocutor approving of the taxed account of expenses, and giving decree for them, and against that interlocutor it is now sought to appeal, with the view of having all the previous interlocutors brought under review.

Objection has been taken to the competency. It is said, in the first place, that a final judgment having been extracted and implemented by payment, it can no longer be reviewed; and, in the second place, that an appeal against a decree for expenses is incompetent and unwarranted.

The appellant says that as he has brought his appeal within fourteen days of the decree for expenses, it is quite competent, and brings all previous interlocutors under review.

I am not for sustaining this appeal to any effect. Mr Rhind contended that the extract was incompetent, because the proceedings in the case were not terminated, as was shewn by the fact that expenses were decerned for afterwards. If he is right in that view there is a great deal to be said for the competency of the appeal. But it appears to me that that question has been settled by section 32 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876, which provides,—“Notwithstanding anything contained in section 68 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, extract of any judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order pronounced in the ordinary Sheriff Court may be issued at any time on the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the same shall, if competent, have been sooner appealed against, and no extract of any such judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order shall be issued before the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute who pronounced the same shall allow the extract to be sooner issued.”

That is a very unqualified provision; and if fourteen days have elapsed from the date of any extractable judgment, then, I think, extract of it is competent. That was the case here, because the extract was on 21st April, and the Sheriff's interlocutor was dated on 31st March. It follows, therefore, that this appeal is incompetent, because there can be no appeal against an extracted judgment.

The interlocutor on the merits, therefore, not being subject to appeal, the question comes to be, whether there is any appeal at all. To bring up to this Court a decree for expenses, to the effect of letting the appellant get into a review of the interlocutors upon the merits, would be, by a mere evasion, to set at nought the provisions of the statute. I think, therefore, that it is impossible

¹ Cruickshank v. Smart, Feb. 5, 1870, 8 Macph. 512; A. S., 10th July 1839, sec. 109; Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, secs. 3, 32, 33; Williamson v. M'Lachlan, July 19, 1866, 4 Macph. 1091; Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 68 and 69.

² M'Glashan's Sheriff Court Practice (Barclay's edn.), 327, 349; A. S., 10th July 1839, secs. 113 and 114; Badger v. Lord Blantyre, Nov. 16, 1844, 17 J. 53.

No. 150.

June 22, 1881.
Tennents v.
Romanes.

to sustain the competency of this appeal to that effect. But, besides, an interlocutor giving decree for expenses is not subject to appeal. In the case of Cruickshank v. Smart Lord Deas expressed an opinion to that effect, in which I concurred, though perhaps I did not enter so fully into the question.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. I think this extract was competent and proper; and I have always had the opinion that a mere decree for expenses is not subject to appeal.

LORD MURE.—I concur. I think the provision of the Act of 1876, taken in connection with former practice, is conclusive. The Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1839 does not appear to me to affect the question at all.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. By the statute which regulated these matters before the Act of 1876 an appellant had twenty days from the date of a final interlocutor within which no extract could be issued. The Act of 1876 abridged this period, and parties may now obtain extract within fourteen days. The result is that if the successful party chooses to take extract he excludes appeal, and I think this case is important as pointing that out. Practitioners in the Sheriff Courts should take notice that if they desire to appeal they must do so within fourteen days from the date of a final interlocutor, though expenses have not been decreed for in the Court below, unless, indeed, they have secured themselves by arrangement or otherwise against an extract of the judgment being obtained.

APPEAL dismissed as incompetent.

HAGART & BURN MURDOCH, W.S.—W. BLACK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 151.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

WILLIAM STUART STIRLING CRAWFURD, Complainer.—D.-F. Kinnear—Dundas.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE CLYDE NAVIGATION, Respondents.—Trayner—J. C. Lorimer.

Property—Trespass—Ferry—Road—Public right of way—Interdict.—The Clyde Navigation Trustees having obtained from a riparian proprietor a strip of ground on the bank of the river to be used solely for the purposes of widening and straightening the river, and having thereafter obtained by statute an existing right of ferry over part of the river extending above and below the said strip of ground, established a ferry service, and embarked and discharged passengers at a part of the bank so acquired, which was separated from any public place by the lands of the said proprietor. The proprietor sought to have the trustees interdicted from embarking and discharging passengers at the point in question.

Held that the action was wrongly directed against the trustees, and that the proprietor's proper remedy was an interdict against persons actually trespassing on his lands (disse, Lord Justice-Clerk), who held (1) that the establishment by the trustees of this ferry was contrary to the bona fides of their feu-contract with the complainer, and (2) that they had no right by statute or otherwise to establish a ferry except where they could communicate directly with some public place.

2d DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford Clark.
M.

By feu-contract dated in 1851 Mr W. S. Stirling Crawford of Milton, by his factor, and on the narrative of his powers under a private Act of Parliament in his favour, and of the powers conferred on the Clyde Navigation Trustees by their Act 9 Vict. c. xxiii., conveyed to them two contiguous strips of his lands of Merklands, lying immediately to the north of the river Clyde, as particularly described in said contract, and delineated on a plan indorsed thereon. The northern boundary of the ground conveyed was as follows :—“ On the north by the other parts of the lands of Merklands belonging to the said William Stuart Stirling Crawford, along which it extends from C to E on said plan 2035 feet or thereby on the line to be occupied by the summit of the inclined front of the retaining wall to be erected along the new north margin of the river.” The feu-contract further contained this clause,—“ But this feu-disposition is granted always with and under the following provisions, declarations, and others, viz., that the said second parties and their foresaids shall be bound to appropriate the said two pieces of ground wholly and exclusively to the widening and straightening of the river Clyde, and also shall be bound to erect a substantial embanking or retaining wall along the new brink of the river as delineated on said plan, and uphold and maintain the same at their expense, and shall form and maintain two watering-places, one at the east and another at the west end of said ground disposed in the second place, besides steps at convenient distances in said embanking wall for access to the river, and shall also plant a thorn hedge in lieu of the one partly taken away by the second parties’ operations and partly still remaining, and that at such a distance from and parallel with the said retaining wall as may be pointed out by the said first party or his managers, and shall protect said hedge by stob and rail in the usual manner; also declaring that the foresaid ground is hereby disposed to the said second parties for the sole purposes contained in the foresaid Act, 9th Victoria, chapter 23d, and the Acts therein recited, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon of the nature of public works, stores, warehouses, or dwelling-houses.”

No. 151.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

By the “Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858” (21 and 22 Vict. c. cxlix.), the undertaking of the trustees is defined to consist, inter alia, of “the forming and erecting on both sides of the river of such jetties, banks, walls, sluices, and works, and such fences for making, securing, confining, and maintaining the channel of the river within proper bounds as the trustees shall think necessary . . . the erection, construction, and mooring of such beacons and buoys as may be necessary or expedient for the use and guidance of vessels in the harbour and in the river.”

Section 113 of said Act confirms a feu-contract dated in 1856 by which the trustees acquired from Mrs Jane Graham Gilbert of Yorkhill, with consent of her husband, a piece of ground therein described, with the ferry-house adjoining the Govan Ferry, and also the right of ferry across the river between the following boundaries, viz., the Milebridge or Kinninghouse Burn on the east, and Marlinford on the west, with the whole rights, servitudes, and privileges thereto belonging, for a feu-duty of £800 per annum.

Section 114 provides that the trustees “shall be entitled to provide one or more ferry-boats for the convenience of persons passing from one side of the river to another to the east of Marlinford, and to levy such reasonable rates for the use of such boats, and the tear and wear of the works of the trustees as they shall consider reasonable, not exceeding one halfpenny for each passenger.”

In September 1880 the Clyde Trustees established a ferry across the river Clyde to and from a point ex adverso of the said lands of Merklands. The said ferry was east of Marlinford. Mr Stirling Crawford presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Clyde Trustees, praying the Court to “interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said respondents, and all others acting under their orders or authority, from ferrying passengers on the river Clyde to and from the complainer’s lands of Merklands, on the north bank of the said river, and landing passengers thereon, or embarking them therefrom, and from establishing or using a ferry on the said river

No. 151. at any point ex adverso of the said lands, and from erecting any landing-stage, ferry steps, or other accessories for the above purposes upon or ex adverso of said lands; and to ordain the said respondents to remove any such landing-stage or others which they may have already erected on or ex adverso of the said lands."

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The complainer averred that the said ferry had been established without his knowledge or consent; that part of the ferry steps and a gas lamp, posts, &c. were erected on his land and beyond the boundary of the lands conveyed by him to the respondents; and that the respondents by this ferry, illegally and to his damage, daily brought crowds of persons upon his lands, over which there was no public right of way whatever.

The respondents denied that any part of their works was on the property of the complainer. They founded on the sections of their Act of 1858, above quoted, in support of their right to convey passengers across the river at points within the statutory limits of their right of ferry. They further averred that "there is a footpath, measuring in some parts about twenty feet wide, in daily uninterrupted use by the public along the whole extent of the complainer's lands fronting the river."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The complainer being proprietor of the said lands, and the respondents having no right to ferry passengers to or from said lands, or to land passengers thereon, or embark them therefrom, or to establish or use a ferry at any point ex adverso thereof, the complainer is entitled to interdict as craved. (2) The complainer is entitled to have the respondents prohibited from erecting on or ex adverso of his said lands any ferry steps or other accessories for the purpose of ferrying and landing or embarking passengers, and to have them ordained to remove any such works which they may already have erected. (3) The public not having any right of way upon the complainer's lands, the respondents are not entitled to maintain a ferry for their convenience at the place in question.

The respondents pleaded;—(2) The respondents have by their titles and statutes right to maintain a ferry across the Clyde at the place in question. (3) No part of the ferry works on the north side of the river being erected on the complainer's property, but only on the river wall, which is vested in the respondents, the complainer is not entitled to interdict. (4) The public being, in point of fact, in the use and enjoyment of the footpath along the river bank, the respondents are entitled to maintain a ferry for their convenience at the place in question.

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, from which it appeared that large numbers of the public, consisting chiefly of workmen from the neighbouring shipbuilders' yards, daily used the ferry in question, and reached a public way by crossing over a portion of the lands of Merklands. It was further proved that the numbers of persons in use to walk upon the said lands by the river bank had greatly increased during the last ten or fifteen years, owing to the larger number of shipbuilding yards in the neighbourhood, and the erection by the respondents of the ferry now complained of, and of previous ferries, now removed. There was some conflict of evidence as to how far back any use of the lands by the public could be traced.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the reasons of suspension, and refused the note.*

* "NOTE.—In 1851 the respondents acquired in feu from the complainer a strip of ground on the north side of the Clyde, being a part of lands of Merklands. The purpose of this acquisition was to enable them to widen the river. This was done, and a retaining wall was erected on the north margin. On the

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—The question whether the respondents' ferry works were erected entirely in suo was not material. Even assuming they were so, these strips of land having been acquired by the trustees from the complainer for the special purpose of "widening and straightening the river Clyde," the right of fee conveyed was a qualified one, and the trustees could not lawfully use the land for any other purpose. They were violating the bona fides of the feu-contract by using it for a purpose prejudicial to their author.¹ Their statutory right of ferry did not warrant them in landing passengers except where their ferry steps adjoined a public place. Here they could only reach a public road by crossing a strip of the complainer's private ground.² The action was properly and competently directed against the trustees. They were the most substantial, though not the only invaders of the complainer's rights. The public, as such, could suffer no prejudice by any decree pronounced in this action.

No. 151.
June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The Clyde Trustees replied;—The public were, in point of fact, in the daily habit of walking along the complainer's lands, and the trustees could not be called upon, in a question with him, to decide their right to do so, or the reverse. The complainer's remedy was against the public;

top of this retaining wall the respondents have erected a gas lamp and certain posts, &c., in connection with a ferry which they have recently established at that point over the Clyde. The first question is whether these things have been erected on their own property, or on the property of the complainer?

"For the complainer it is contended that the boundary of the respondents is the line occupied by the summit of the inclined front of the retaining wall, and it follows from this contention that the retaining wall belongs partly to the respondents and partly to the complainer. The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt this view of the feu-contract. The ground given off is defined by a plan annexed to the feu-contract, and is described as amounting to a certain number of square yards. The north boundary is thus given in the feu-contract:—'On the north by the other parts of the lands of Merklands belonging to the said William Stuart Stirling Crawford, along which it extends from C to E on said plan 2035 feet on the line to be occupied by the summit of the inclined front of the retaining wall to be erected along the new north margin of the river.' This line is not given as a boundary; but as the line along which the measurement is to be made, and having regard to the fact the north boundary is the lands of Merklands, the Lord Ordinary cannot hold that any part of the retaining wall erected by the respondents is beyond the limits of their feu.

"The respondents adduced evidence from certain plans to shew that they had not encroached on the complainer's property. The Lord Ordinary has doubts whether this evidence is legitimate, and he does not proceed upon it.

"A more important question is whether the respondents are entitled to maintain their ferry. Apart from the consideration which the Lord Ordinary has already noticed, the complainer contends that the use of the ferry brings on his lands a great number of persons who have no right to be there, inasmuch as there is no public road on the north side of the river, and therefore no access to or from the ferry. But it was proved that for a number of years past the public have been in use to use the north side of the Clyde as a public road. It seems to the Lord Ordinary that the respondents cannot be required to try with the complainer whether this right does or does not exist; and that so long as the public use continues the respondents cannot be prohibited from continuing their ferry. They do not directly invade any right of the complainer, inasmuch as all the passengers are taken and landed on ground belonging to them."

¹ Bostock v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, May 25, 1852, 5 De G. & S. 584; Norton v. London and North-Western Railway Company, July 15, 1878, L. R. 9 Chan. Div. 623.

² Colquhoun v. Paton and Others, June 7, 1859, 21 D. 996, 31 Scot. Jur. 550; Duke of Montrose v. M'Intyre, March 10, 1848, 10 D. 896, 20 Scot. Jur. 317.

No. 151.

June 22, 1881.
 Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

the Clyde Trustees committed no trespass; they merely, in the exercise of their duty as statutory ferrymen, conveyed passengers across the river within the limits of their ferry right, receiving and discharging them at lawful places, and were not concerned to inquire further whence they had come, or whither they were going.

LORD YOUNG.—In this case Mr Stirling Crawford seeks to interdict the Clyde Trustees from landing or embarking passengers at a certain place ex adverso, as he describes it, of his property.

He states as one and the material ground for his application for interdict—the ground which the Lord Ordinary deals with first—that to a certain extent the landing appliances are erected upon his own property. He says that a gas-lamp and also certain posts erected by the respondents are still within the southern boundary line of the complainer's lands; and he also avers that the topmost step of the stair, leading up from the river level, encroaches to the extent of a few inches upon his ground.

To dispose of that matter first, I may say I am of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that this ground fails upon the fact, for I am of opinion that, in point of fact, the lamp-post and the step in question are wholly upon the property of the Clyde Trustees. But it was observed in the course of the discussion—and I repeat it, because I think it a sound observation—that the case substantially, and so far as it is really of any interest or importance, would be the same although these erections had, to the extent alleged, been encroachments upon the pursuer's property. No doubt it would have been necessary to take them down, but the question of landing or embarking there would have remained all the same.

Now, the next ground upon which he asks to interdict the respondents is, that by landing or embarking passengers on their own property there they are violating the condition of the title upon which they hold the subjects that had been disposed to them some years ago. That title was granted under certain provisions and declarations, one of which was—"The said second parties and their foresaids shall be bound to appropriate the said two pieces of ground wholly and exclusively to the widening and straightening of the river Clyde, and also shall be bound to erect a substantial embanking or retaining wall along the new brink of the river as delineated on said plan, and uphold and maintain the same at their expense; and shall form and maintain two watering-places, one at the east and another at the west end of said ground disposed in the second place, besides steps at convenient distances in said embanking wall for access to the river; and shall also plant a thorn hedge in lieu of the one partly taken away by the second parties' operations and partly still remaining, and that at such a distance from and parallel with the said retaining wall as may be pointed out by the said first party or his managers, and shall protect said hedge by stob and rail in the usual manner."

The only other declaration of any importance is that which follows immediately thereafter—"Declaring that the foresaid ground is hereby disposed to the said second parties for the sole purposes contained in the foresaid Act 9th Victoria, chapter 23d, and the Acts therein recited, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon of the nature of public works, stores, warehouses, or dwelling-houses."

Now, the Clyde Trustees are the conservators of the navigation of the Clyde, it being their duty to take such measures as may be necessary for deepening and widening the river, and to act generally as the guardians of the navigation, and they purchased the little bit of ground to which these clauses refer from the complainer in that character. It is provided by a subsequent statute, no doubt —and that may be kept in view—that they shall be entitled to acquire rights of ferry across the river, not for any purpose of profit, of course—for the Trustees are not a body instituted for the purpose of making profit; they exist to promote and guard the interests of navigation in the Clyde, and all the dues they collect are to be expended upon these purposes. But the authority granted to them, possibly ob majorem cautelam, by Parliament, to acquire rights of ferry, is clearly in their character of river guardians. It is not that they may carry on the business of ferrying to profit, but that they may have the command of this great water highway, and that others having proprietary rights of ferry may not interfere—that is to say, use their rights so that they might interfere—with the purposes of navigation.

No. 151.
June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

Therefore I regard their position as having rights of ferry as altogether cognate to their position as trustees of the river, and, as such, guardians of the navigation.

Now, the place where they so land and embark, as the complainer alleges, is within the limits of the ferry which was acquired, and acquired after the acquisition of this piece of ground of the complainer's. It was not a ferry station, so to speak. The subject of ferry-right was naturally introduced into the argument here, and has been frequently referred to, although, in my view of the matter, it really does not materially affect the question which we have to consider. A ferry, as it naturally exists, is a right and a duty to convey passengers across a river or narrow estuary between two places, and the right is generally exercised and the duty performed between two stated places, commonly thus continuing a highway which ends on each side of the river or estuary. That, I think, is the common illustration of a ferry. It is that which most frequently occurs, and with which, therefore, we are most familiar; but that, although the most common illustration of what a ferry is, does not exhaust the notion of a right of ferry. The right which is thus exercised, with the corresponding duty, has very extensive limits. The ferry here has considerable limits up and down the river where it exists, and nobody else is entitled to convey passengers for hire across the water within these limits but the ferryman—not that he is entitled to encroach upon private ground anywhere, but that his right of ferry to carry across the river exists within these limits. If he proposes to exercise that right or perform that duty anyhow, in a manner that will invade the legal rights of others existing within the limits of his ferry, he will be stopped. But his right of ferry exists within the limits of the ferry for all that, with this only restraint upon the use of it—a restraint of a character joined to the exercise or use of all rights—that you must so use the right as not to invade the rights of others; and, of course, if a ferryman use his right so as to invade private property anywhere within the limits of his property he must be stopped.

Now, the particular species facti here, beyond what I have already stated, is this:—The banks of the river at this place, like the river itself, have gone very extensively into business of recent years. There are large shipbuilding yards on both sides of the river, and some of the workmen in the shipbuilding yards on the north side require accommodation on the other side of the river—the other side from where they work—where I suppose they can get it more cheaply and more conveniently. Accordingly, they pass from the north side, where their work is, in the case of some of those shipbuilding yards, to the south side, where their houses are, for the night, and I suppose also for their meals. They have been doing that in

No. 151. increasing numbers for years, just as the business on the banks of the river was increasing. The trade on the banks of this great river is increasing very much ; and it has been admitted on both sides that in point of fact workmen to the number of hundreds, and latterly of thousands, have gone upon the banks of the Clyde here, and embarked where they could get a boat to take them to their houses upon the south side of the river for meals and for the night. The Clyde Trustees had the sole right to carry them across for hire, although, if consistent with the interests of the navigation, of which they were the guardians, they might have allowed others to carry passengers across. Possibly that was done to a large extent. But the trustees in any case had the matter in their own hands, being the proprietors of the right of ferry. That was the very purpose of their being in that position—as I have already pointed out—the purpose, namely, of controlling and regulating the passage of the river. And thus, when the workmen came and presented themselves on the bank here (where they had a strip of property of their own) in hundreds, and latterly in thousands, they considered it to be according to their right, if not according to their duty, to afford those large numbers of the public the accommodation of their ferryboat across the river, and they did so within the limits of their ferry.

The question is, whether they could afford that accommodation to those hundreds and thousands without invading any private right.

Now, they took the people on board their boats where they presented themselves on the banks of the river—upon the property of the Clyde Trustees themselves—and they landed them there again when they were returning to or from work. But the pursuer says,—“The strip of ground immediately beyond that, and between them and their workplaces, is my private property, which they had no right to cross, and which they could not cross without trespassing.” In reply to that the trustees say,—“Well, that is not our affair. The public present themselves in great numbers upon the river bank, demanding to be carried across, and we carry them across ; whether they were trespassing before they came there or not is not our affair. If they were upon your ground you should stop them. But don't come to us about that, or ask to interdict us from taking them across the river upon the assumption that they were trespassing. We are not the parties to try that question with you. These workmen have been doing what they are doing now for the last eleven years,—only they have very much increased in numbers of recent years. Formerly, and before we accommodated them as we have been doing at this point, they only trespassed more, as you say, along the bank which is your property. We are taking them up at a point nearer to their work—within a few yards of their work. But if they are trespassing over these few yards, pray establish that in a question with them, and stop them ; and if they don't come there to demand passage across the river we won't take them. We have no desire to do so. We cannot assume that they are trespassing, because you are permitting them to come, and it is not to the purpose to say that you will incur some obloquy if you raise the question and try to stop them. They are the proper parties—the proper contradictors—in such a question as you mean to raise ; and you are not to stop me upon an assumption against me in a question in which I am not the natural contradictor. I am not the proper party to try that question with. You are not to stop me, on an assumption adverse to the public, from carrying the public across the river when they present themselves there.”

Now, I have stated the position of the respondents in the way it presents itself to me. That is the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken, and I think No. 151. it is the right view.

Now, I have already given this illustration of my view, that the right of ferry here was a mere accidental circumstance in the case, and not materially involved in the consideration of it. Suppose the river Clyde instead of being a waterway had been a landway or highway, which, instead of being traversed by boats, had been traversed by tramways and omnibuses—a number of the public present themselves on the highway (for this river bank, so far as the property of the Clyde Trustees is concerned, is part of their highway—it may be put under water by them when and how they please; it is the margin of it), I say the public present themselves on this part of the highway—they may or may not have trespassed in getting there; but they present themselves there. Are they not to be taken into the tramway cars or into the omnibuses; or is the proprietor who alleges they have trespassed over this ground to come and say, “You are not to take these people across, because they have trespassed over my ground; and if you dispute that, the presumption in the meantime is against you that they were trespassing, for it is my private property, and it is not established that they had a right. To be sure, you are not the proper party to try the question whether they had a right or not, and I will not incur the obloquy of trying it with them; but it shall be assumed against you that they have not the right, and therefore you shall be interdicted from taking them into the car or omnibus.”

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

I cannot assent to that. I think the action is directed against the wrong party. If the pursuer means to try the question, whether he is entitled to stop the public from doing what they have been doing, without any interference or interruption on his part, for years past, he must bring his action against them—against those who are committing the trespass—and establish his proposition against them, and stop them from doing what admittedly they have been doing for many years. It is not the embarkation into a boat on the river that is the point at this stage of the controversy. They did embark from the bank. And I should say that anybody who is entitled to be on the bank without trespass is entitled to go into a boat from the bank, or out of a boat on to the bank. And if the pursuer means to establish, or thinks he can establish, this proposition, about the right of people to go on that ground which has been so long used by the public, and is not hindered by considerations of prudence, or otherwise, from bringing an action for that purpose, he must bring his action against those who, according to his allegation, commit the trespass. Whether the boat belongs to a person having a right of ferry, or belongs to anybody having a right to ply it upon the river Clyde, I think the boatowner is entitled to say—“I take up that passenger on the margin of the river, where he is not trespassing, and I put him down again upon the place where he commits no trespass by having his foot there. He assures me that he will find his own way from that place where I put him down or take him up to the place of his work; and he will maintain his right to find his way from it against anybody who disputes it. I am not to be interdicted and told, ‘Oh, but I don’t like to try the question with him, I would rather try it with you,’ for in a process of that sort I am not the natural party to try the question with.”

I do not think that is the correct position to put such a matter into. The complainer begins his interdict at the very point where all attempt at trespass

No. 151.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation
Trustees.

on his property ceases, or at the place where it does not begin. I am not going to assume that there was a trespass before, and I am not going to assume that there will be a trespass after—before in the case of embarking passengers, or after in the case of landing passengers. I say I am not going to assume that. The question is not here, and is not to be tried in this process. The public have been trespassing, as Mr Crawford calls it, in hundreds and in thousands for some considerable time. I do not say it is too late to stop them if they have been invading any right, but, as I have indicated, it is not for those who have been doing no wrong in carrying people across the Clyde to try such a question with the aggrieved party. It is for the aggressors or trespassers.

Upon these grounds, and without determining anything in favour of or against the public, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the question is not one for the Clyde Trustees to try, and that they are entitled to take these passengers across the Clyde. I do not know that the case would have been very materially different—that is to say, I am not sure that I would not have arrived at the same conclusion, although there might have been other considerations to be taken into account, had the Clyde Trustees not possessed any property here, or had the owner of the boat which took the people across not possessed any property at all. I have not yet heard any satisfactory answer to the question which I ventured to put yesterday. Suppose a private property, or private grounds, descending to the banks of a river such as the Thames, with a private ornamental stair leading down to the river: The proprietor of these grounds can certainly prevent any trespass upon them. He could prevent anybody using his steps, upon the assumption that I am now making. But if a crowd of people presented themselves there, with whom he was not interfering, and I took them into my boat, which was lawfully upon the river Thames, or upon the river which passed the property, I would not invade his right in any way—I would commit no trespass upon him. I do not deny his right, or violate his right, or do anything actionable against him. The trustees commit nothing actionable against this complainer—give him no ground for an action for damages or otherwise—by carrying people across the river Clyde. People who trespass over his ground are committing an actionable wrong, assuming that there is a trespass. But there is no wrong done by the man who carries these same people on the river—I mean no wrong done to the complainer. The right of ferry is really not in question, for that is a mere franchise—a right to prohibit other people from carrying passengers for hire there. There would be no actionable wrong committed by the proprietor of a boat who took up people from the private stair I have supposed, or who landed people on the private stair—no such wrong on the grounds I am stating. They may be the party's own servants out without leave. But whoever they may be, you must take your remedy against those who are doing you the injury, withholding your right, or denying your right, or disobeying your authority. But you have nothing to do with those who may carry them, after they get on to a public road or a public river.

In every view, therefore, and without determining that Mr Crawford is not in a position to exclude all the world from this ground behind the river bank at the point in question, and still less indicating an opinion that he is in a position to do that, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right, and that upon the grounds which he has stated in his note, and which I have only, perhaps unnecessarily, amplified and illustrated.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion as that which has been expressed No. 151.
by Lord Young and by the Lord Ordinary.

The question which has been decided by the Lord Ordinary, and which we have now to determine, is one undoubtedly of very great interest. I have listened to the argument with great attention, and confess the question is one of some nicety. But in the end, and on grounds that have appeared to me to be perfectly satisfactory, and without very much hesitation, I have arrived at the conclusion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

In dealing with this matter it is necessary to keep in view two portions of the prayer for interdict. The first part of it asks that the Clyde Trustees, "and all others acting under their orders or authority," be interdicted "from ferrying passengers on the river Clyde to and from the complainer's lands of Merklands, on the north bank of the said river." The second part of the prayer asks that they be interdicted "from landing passengers thereon, or embarking them therefrom, and from establishing or using a ferry on the said river at any point ex adverso of the said lands, and from erecting any landing stage, ferry steps, or other accessories for the above purposes upon or ex adverso of the said lands," &c.

Now, I think the decision in regard to the one part of the prayer need not necessarily be the decision as regards the other. If the trustees are not able, without going on the complainer's lands, to take in and put out passengers, it may quite well be the complainer has an enforceable right against them. But it is an entirely different affair to say that if the Clyde Trustees have a landing place of their own not on the complainer's lands of Merklands, not even touching them, and they are taking passengers there in virtue of the right to ferry them which they possess, yet the complainer, for the grounds he has set forth, is to be entitled to an interdict by which the use of this ferry would be stopped.

Upon this last question it appears to me that it must be determined pretty much on the terms of the statute of 1858, and I think the complainer in insisting on his remedy against the Clyde Trustees has overlooked entirely, or at least to a very large extent, the provisions of that statute, which are set forth upon the record.

In the first place, and with reference to the first point which the Lord Ordinary has decided, I am clearly of opinion that all to the south of the north edge of the coping is the property of the Clyde Trustees, and that everything that is part and parcel of their landing place is upon their own ground. In taking in passengers from the shore, or landing them again, they do not use one bit of ground which belongs to anybody else.

That being so, what is the other consideration upon which it is said that interdict ought to be granted? It is, that to allow a ferry to be established here would be contrary to the good faith of the contract by which in 1851 the ground in question was acquired by the Clyde Trustees from the complainer.

Now, it is perfectly possible that the Clyde Trustees might have sought to put the ground to a purpose inconsistent with the good faith of the contract, and if that had been shewn to have been the case very probably Mr Crawford would have had a good cause of complaint, and the trustees might have been prevented from making such a misappropriation or misuse of the ground acquired by them for certain purposes.

But what was the purpose it was acquired for? The purpose was that it should all be used for the purpose of widening and straightening the river Clyde, which then was and long had been an important navigable river. Is it not the case that all the ground embraced in lot No. 1, as well as in lot No. 2, has been used for this purpose by the absorption of this ground, so to speak, into the alveus of the river? The river has certainly been widened, and it has also been straightened; and these two purposes of widening and straightening having been served, if ground at the foot of the wall or if the face of the wall can consistently with anything to be found in the feu-contract be used as an access to or from the river, it does not appear to me that such use involves any contravention of any condition, express or implied, in the contract.

No. 151.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

But the fact of the matter is, as I have already said, that all that is done in the way of embarking or landing passengers is done within the boundaries of the trust. The steps themselves are part and parcel of the wall. The erection of these steps is not contrary to anything that is to be found in the contract. On the contrary, the complainer, if he had been so minded, might have caused the erection of these steps for his own convenience. But the steps were erected by the respondents without any necessity being imposed upon them to do so; and after having been constructed for a purpose which was obviously one of the purposes for which such steps or cope was to be put up they are only using them now for a perfectly legitimate purpose.

All that being so, the question comes to be, on what ground is it that the complainer is to be granted interdict? It must be upon this ground, that there being no right of public way over the lands of Merklands, of which he is proprietor, all who reach the landing station at the ferry going across these lands must be held to be persons who are not within the purview of the Act of Parliament of 1858, by which authority was granted to the Clyde Trustees to place a ferryboat or ferry at any point where the public might be conveniently served to the east of the lands of Marlinford. Now, it humbly appears to me that that is not a matter with reference to which the trustees are entitled to interfere. It is not a matter certainly upon which they are bound to interfere. The thing the Act of Parliament provides is this, that the Clyde Trustees are to be "entitled to provide one or more ferry-boats for the convenience of persons passing from one side of the river to another to the east of Marlinford, and to levy such reasonable rates for the use of such boats, and the tear and wear of the works of the trustees, as they shall consider reasonable, not exceeding one halfpenny for each passenger." This is their right, and who are the persons to be served? They are persons who may desire to pass from one side to the other. But these persons are landed on ground belonging to the Clyde Trustees. The Clyde Trustees' ferry-boats land them upon their own ground; and in the use of the ferry-boat there is no encroachment whatever on the right of property belonging to the complainer.

But it is said that the persons seeking to cross must be divided into two classes. One class are supposed to be, or must be presumed to be, trespassers. Another class are those who in one way or another have come to the landing place, and have a right, or are supposed to have a right, which may be exercised, and which therefore involves no trespass on the property of anybody. But this is not a matter for the trustees to take up and deal with. Their duty in regard to the matter is this: If they establish a ferry at any place for the convenience of the public, the public may resort to the ferry station, which is their own, and the use of which involves no encroachment on the property of another. Having put a boat there, I think they are entitled to take these persons, without inquiring where they came from or what rights they had exercised in reaching the station, and ferry them across. It would be a very extraordinary thing were it otherwise. The trustees are not the persons themselves by whom the encroachment was made. They only take those who come to them and desire that they shall be ferried across. If there has been a wrong done, it has been a wrong done before the passengers reached the ground from which they embark. Is this complainer to be heard when he complains that the Clyde Trustees take passengers across who come to them desiring to be ferried to the other side, when he is doing nothing meanwhile to prevent the use of his ground by the people who come? Surely not. It is by the use of his ground that they are enabled to present themselves. Surely the first thing to be done is to prevent these people using his ground. If he can prevent them using his ground he ought to do so, and then the annoyance will, so far at least, be put a stop to also. If he has made the attempt to prevent them, and has not succeeded because of the violence of those who desire to be the passengers in the ferry-boat, it might be—I do not say it would be—that the trustees in taking up, so to speak, those who are guilty of the violence by which an illegal trespass was constituted, might be held as having participated in the wrongdoing. Whether that would be the case, looking to the terms of the Act of Parliament, or indeed apart from the Act altogether, it is not necessary to inquire. But when the fact is not only that the complainer does nothing to prevent persons, who he says are trespassers, reaching the landing or embarking place, but, on the contrary, permits them to reach that spot, he cannot be heard to say that the Clyde Trustees, in the exercise of a lawful right, shall not ferry passengers from one side of the river to the other, because somehow or other those whom they carry reach the ferry in consequence of a trespass. Trespass or no trespass is not a question with which the Clyde Trustees have anything to do. They only look at the persons who are at their landing place seeking to go from one side to the other; and according to my view, however these persons have reached that place, so far as appears from the terms of the Act of Parliament, the Clyde Trustees are entitled to carry them across. That being their right, they cannot be subjected to the interdict craved.

Upon these general grounds I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is my misfortune, and I consider it a great misfortune, to differ from your Lordships as to the result of this case. Being conscious that the Lord Ordinary's view has been adopted by your Lordships, it is perhaps not desirable that I should express much in the way of dissent. Nor do I desire to do so. At the same time, it is only fair to the parties, that entertaining as I do a very clear opinion in the opposite direction, I should express the grounds of it. And I should express my opinion with more modification and reluctance were it not that I am not surprised at our differing, seeing that we differ mainly upon the question we have to try. I do not imagine the question we have to try is, who has to prove the right or non-existence of a right of way on the part of the public over this ground on the top of the embankment? I do not think that question is in the case at all.

The proprietor of the ground here (Mr Stirling Crawford) complains that, contrary to the good faith of an express contract with him, the Clyde Trustees have established a ferry station at the margin of the river upon ground that he

No. 151.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

No. 151. conveyed to them by express disposition, and that without the means of connecting it with any public road or way except what they acquire by trespass. The trustees say, it is none of our business whether these persons who come to us seeking to be ferried across have trespassed or not. And I should in some circumstances have thought there was great weight in that contention. But the Lord Ordinary seems to think that the real ground on which the action should be dismissed is, that it is directed against the wrong person. It is clearly directed against the right parties, if there is a good ground of action, and no other parties could possibly have been the defenders in this case. And I shall state very shortly my impression on the whole of this matter.

June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The ground in question belonged to the complainer, Mr Crawford. The public had no right to the ground that was disposed of by him. It is not said that they had ; but it appeared for the public interest that an embankment, and a widening of the stream should take place at that point, and it being private property, the Clyde Navigation Trustees made a specific bargain with Mr Crawford for the acquisition of the ground, but on certain terms, which I imagine to be as clearly enforceable now as when they were originally granted. It is expressly set out—and this truly is the foundation of the whole of this matter, and excludes, therefore, nine-tenths at least of the matters that were argued from the bar—that the feu-disposition was granted with and under the following provisions—that the said second parties and their foreshaids shall be bound to appropriate the said two pieces of ground wholly and exclusively to the widening and the straightening of the river Clyde, and shall be liable to maintain a substantial embankment. They are not entitled to do anything else with the ground, and the question is, whether they have not done something else with it.

But that is not all. There is a provision about planting a thorn hedge in lieu of the one taken away, and protecting it by stobs and rails, which means nothing but this, that the ground on the other side of the hedge was the private property of the disponer. It can mean nothing else, and does mean nothing else. And then the deed says—"Also declaring that the foreshaid ground is hereby disposed to the said second parties for the sole purposes contained in the foreshaid Act 9th Victoria, chapter 23d, and the Acts therein recited, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon of the nature of public works, stores, warehouses, or dwelling-houses." It seems to be thought by my brother Lord Craighill that that is modified or over-ridden by the Act of 1858. I am entirely of a different opinion. At the date of this disposition to the Clyde Trustees they had no right of ferry whatever. They acquired a right of ferry in 1858, and had previously acquired a right of specific ferry from the opposite side, to a point not far from the place in question, and they propose now, and did propose three years ago, to put down a ferry station at the foot of the embankment which they made under this conveyance. The question which the complainer has to try is, whether they could do that under the terms of their conveyance and looking to the nature of the rights of parties in that ground? How anybody else but the trustees could be defender in such an action I cannot conceive ; nor how it can be imagined for a moment that the Clyde Trustees could enter into a proof to establish a public right of way with other parties with whom they had no concern I am unable to understand. In short, I think a false issue has been presented by the respondents here from the very first, and that that question has really nothing to do with the true matter we have to solve. And my solution of it may be given on two grounds. In the first place, I am of opinion that after having this conveyance granted to them, if they had acquired a right of ferry, and had proposed to set a ferry station down there, it was a direct violation of the provisions of this contract. It is in vain to say it is for the accommodation of the public. They acquired the ground under conditions that they are bound to fulfil. No doubt the stations which the Act of 1858 authorised them to put down were stations along the banks, but that that Act authorised them to violate the conditions on which for the public good they had obtained this piece of ground is to my mind a position that is wholly untenable. Even as regards stations put down under the authority of the Act of Parliament, they required, in the first place, to have acquired a private right to the landing-place, and, in the second place, to connect it with some public road or way.

No. 151.
June 22, 1881.
Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

Therefore the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong is this, that this putting down of a station at such a point as that in question is a use of the ground acquired that is prohibited by the very terms of the disposition itself.

But observe what the effect of it is. This staircase that was to be made for the benefit of the complainer is now to be handed over to the public. It becomes a public way, and nothing else. Those who communicate to this place a right of ferry induce people to come to it, and they acquire a right over it—at all events, if they use it for the prescriptive period; and certainly the proprietor never intended to grant any such right as that. Nor did he ever contemplate that the staircase—a bargain made for his own convenience—was to be altered in such a way by this Act.

But the second view I take—and I hold it very strongly—is, that they were not entitled to put down any station here under their right of ferry unless they could communicate directly with some public way. They admit and cannot deny that the ground upon which they discharge their passengers from their ferry, or right of ferry, is private ground; but they also say that the public are allowed to come here. Well, if the ground had been acquired in the ordinary way without limitation there might be a question as to how far there was a presumption that the people who came there were entitled to be there; but when I find that the ground was given for a totally different purpose, and that the trustees unquestionably induced the people to come by putting down this ferry station contrary to their title, that I think raises an entirely different question. I am of opinion that they were not entitled to do that. And I may say further, that I think all illustrations taken from persons unconnected with the proprietor of the ground, who derive no title from him, are wholly apart from and outside of the real merits of this question.

I have said enough to indicate the view I take. Your Lordships adhere to the interlocutor.

THE COURT adhered, and found the respondents entitled to additional expenses.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 152.

ALEXANDER ROSS YEOMAN (Officer of Excise), Appellant.—
Sol.-Gen. Balfour—Rutherford.

M'INTOSH BROTHERS, Respondents.—Mackintosh—M'Kechnie.

June 22, 1881.
 Yeoman v.
 M'Intosh
 Brothers.

Revenue—Excise—Spirits Act 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. cap. 114), secs. 170-188—Entries in dealer's stock-book (1) where spirits obtained by "grogging," and (2) where "samples."—Held, upon a construction of the 170th to the 188th sections of the Spirits Act, 1860, that, alike with spirits obtained by "grogging" as with those received in the ordinary way, an omission by the dealer or retailer to insert in his stock-book the number of the permit or certificate, the Christian and surname of the person, or the name of the firm, from whom, and of the place from which the spirits were received, will entitle the Commissioners of Excise to disregard those entries, and will involve the statutory penalty if the amount of spirits in possession exceeds the amount duly entered.

Held that a dealer in spirits, whom the Commissioners of Excise had allowed to take samples of spirits out of bond, free from duty, and without a permit or certificate, was entitled, after using them for the purposes of his business, to put the surplus into stock, and that the Commissioners in balancing his stock-book were bound to take into account the entries therein of such spirits.

1st Division.
 Exchequer Cause.
 B.

THE Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed certain penalties from Messrs Mackintosh Brothers, dealers in and retailers of spirits, Leith, in respect of alleged contravention of the Spirits Act, 1860.

The information was originally brought before the Petty Sessions for the county of Edinburgh, who found the respondents not guilty of any of the offences charged.

An appeal was taken to the Quarter Sessions, who, before pronouncing judgment, stated this case for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer.

The following were the facts:—“(1) The respondents before, and at the date of the offence alleged, . . . were licensed dealers in and retailers of spirits, and traded in both capacities on the same premises, all the spirits in their possession, whether as dealers or retailers, forming one stock. (2) On 8th and 9th December 1879 certain officers of excise took an account of all the spirits in the stock and possession of the respondents, and balanced their stock-book. By disregarding the entries of 'grog,' and of samples of spirits after mentioned, the officers found an excess in the stock or possession of the respondents of 680·8 gallons of proof spirits. . . . (3) The total number of entries of 'grog' and samples made by the respondents, and disregarded by the officers in balancing the stock-book, was 2220; and if these entries had been taken into account by the officers no excess, but a deficiency, would have been found in the stock in possession of the respondents. These entries, as made by the respondents in the stock-book, did not contain the number of any permit or certificate, nor the Christian name and surname of the person, or the name of the firm from whom, and of what place the 'grog' and samples were received. The respondents did not deliver to the officers any permit or certificate received by them along with the 'grog' and samples appearing under such entries. In the calculation of the stock on hand, and in the balancing of the stock-book, all spirits were computed at proof strength. In calculating the stock on hand, the officers took into account all spirits, including grog, found in the stock or possession, and within the entered premises, of the respondents. In balancing the stock-book, the officers gave effect to all entries therein, containing the particulars required by the statute, of spirits received with permit or certificate, and of spirits sent out accompanied by certificate, including spirits denominated P.S. (plain spirits), while, on the other hand, they disregarded the 2220 entries aforesaid. The following extracts from the stock-book of the respondents shew the pattern of said book, and contain specimens of the said entries of 'grog' and samples, as also of the said plain spirits:—

No. 152.
June 22, 1881.
Yeoman v.
M'Intosh
Brothers.

"AN ACCOUNT OF SPIRITS RECEIVED INTO STOCK.

Date when the Spirits were received.	Number of the Permit or Certificate.	Christian and Surname of the Person, or the Name of the Firm, from whom the Spirits were received.	Of what Place.	Gallons of Spirits received.	Kind or Quality of the Spirits.	Strength of the Spirits.	Gallons at Proof.
1879.
Oct. 31.		Cask No. 5		06	Grog.	83.2 u.p.	1.0
" "		" 597		06	"	89.1 u.p.	.6
" "		" 395		06	"	90.3 u.p.	.5
" "		" 5		06	"	92.5 u.p.	.4
" "		" 181		06	"	85.7 u.p.	.8
" "		" 5		06	"	89.7 u.p.	.6
* *	*	* *	*	*	*	* *	*
Oct. 22.		Nos. 3107, 3108, 3109, 3110, 3111, 3112, 3113, 3114, 3115, 3116, 3117, 3118, 3119, 3120, 3121 — 15 Samples of British Plain Spirits, con- taining 3 gills each.		01½	P. S.	23.4 o.p.	*
* *	*	* *	*	*	*	* *	*

"The entries of 'grog' relate to spirits derived by a process known under the name of 'grogging'.

"'Grogging' is the process by which spirits absorbed by the wood of casks are extracted. When a cask is filled with spirits, part of the spirits is absorbed by the wood. After the cask has been emptied water is put into it, and is allowed to remain for a month or thereby, the cask being rolled about at intervals. By these means the absorbed spirits are extracted, there being a chemical affinity between the water and the alcohol by which the extraction of the latter from the wood is effected, and the spirits so extracted are called 'grog.' (4) Four of the witnesses stated that in their opinion, if a dealer in or retailer of spirits grogs only casks which he receives with spirits brought into his stock with permit or certificate, and adds the grog so obtained to his stock, no excess will be found in the stock arising from such grogging, and that the addition of such grog to the stock would be more than counterbalanced by the loss arising from waste, absorption, or evaporation. The respondents have been in the habit of buying from cask-dealers old spirit casks which they grogged, and added the grog so recovered to their stock, as well as the grog recovered from casks received by them with spirits brought in with permit or certificate; but it did not appear from which set of casks, or in what proportions the alleged excess had been derived. The revenue regulation for charging duty on spirits warehoused is, that on delivery from any customs or excise warehouse of a cask of spirits warehoused

No. 152. therein without payment of duty, duty is charged and paid on the liquid quantity of spirits contained in the cask at the time of delivery.

June 22, 1881.
Yeoman v.
M'Intosh
Brothers.

It was proved that it is the practice of the revenue, in charging duty on spirits, to make an allowance varying from six to twelve per cent for leakage, evaporation, and absorption, according to the time during which the spirits have been in warehouse. . . . As regards samples, the revenue practice is to allow traders to take from every cask of spirits they have in bonded warehouse, two duty-free samples of spirits of three gills each. Duty is charged and paid on any samples drawn in excess of that number. Samples, whether duty-free or duty paid, are allowed to traders to enable them to dispose of the spirits in bulk. No permit or certificate is given with samples. The practice of the respondents was to add to their stock all samples of spirits received by them, so far as not required by them for sampling purposes. To what extent, beyond what is after mentioned, the samples appearing under the entries thereof disregarded by the officers in balancing the stock-book, were added to stock, did not appear. . . . The question put was,—“Whether the aforesaid 2220 entries were rightly disregarded by the excise officers in balancing the respondents' stock-book on 8th and 9th December 1879.”

The case of M'Intosh v. Wilson, Dec. 21, 1878, ante, vol. vi. 443, 16 S. L. R. 477, was referred to.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The decision of the question submitted to us by the Quarter Sessions of Edinburgh depends upon a consideration of the facts stated in this case in connection with certain clauses of the Spirits Act (23 and 24 Vict., c. 114). We had occasion to construe some of those clauses in the case of M'Intosh Brothers v. The Inland Revenue, on the 20th of March 1879, and we there held, upon the construction of sec. 170, that a failure to enter in the book provided by the dealer all spirits received into his stock or sent out constituted an offence against that section, and subjected him to a penalty, and that that offence might be committed more than once in the course of the same day. Upon the construction of the 176th section we held that he was liable in the penalty imposed by that section, if there was, in point of fact, an excess of spirits in his stock beyond that which was entered in the book, no matter from what source that excess of spirits came. In point of fact, we were informed, in the case before us at that time, that the excess was brought about by the operation of grogging.

Now, we have again before us the same question in a somewhat different form and upon different conditions. There is a quantity of spirits in the stock of these dealers which is confessedly produced by the operation of grogging. It is in evidence—and I understand the Quarter Sessions to represent to us that the only evidence in the case is to the effect—that if grogging is carried no further than to extract from the wood of the casks which belong to the dealer himself, and which have come into his stock as full casks, what remains in the wood after the cask has been emptied, that will not raise any practical question, because it will not produce such an excess of stock as to create any offence under the 176th section of the statute. But the parties before us are in the habit of performing this operation of grogging upon a much more extensive scale. They buy casks—empty casks, which had contained spirits—and they extract from the wood of those casks, by the operation which is explained in this case and in the former one, a quantity of spirits, which is added to their stock, and increases their stock beyond what it ought to be if spirits were not obtained by them except in the ordinary way from a distillery or a dealer in spirits.

The precise state of the facts in the present case is this, that on the 8th and 9th of December 1879 the officers of Excise took an account of the spirits in the stock or possession of the respondents, and balanced their stock-books, but in doing so they disregarded certain entries of spirits received in the stock-book, and the question before us is, whether they were right in disregarding those entries. Those entries are 2220 in number, and if they are disregarded then there is an excess over what is properly entered in the stock-book to the extent of 680 gallons. If, on the other hand, those entries are taken into account, then there is no excess of stock, and there can be no penalty.

Now, the way in which the entries are made as regards the spirits obtained by grogging—apart from the question as to samples, with which I shall deal separately—is this: The dates when the spirits have been received are entered in one column. The second column, which ought to contain the number of the permit or certificate accompanying the spirits received, is blank, for a very obvious reason, because there could be neither permit nor certificate accompanying spirits which are obtained by grogging on the premises of the dealer himself. Under the head of “Christian and surname of the person, or the name of the firm, from whom the spirits were received,” there is no name, either Christian or surname, but there is a reference to a cask by its number, from which it is represented of course that the spirits have been obtained by the grogging process. In the column “Of what place,” there is a blank. The quantity in gallons, or fractions of gallons, is stated rightly in the next column; and in the column for “kind or quality of the spirits,” the entry is “grog;” in the next column the “strength of the spirits” is quite rightly given; and in the next the “gallons at proof” are given. Now, it is contended upon the part of the Inland Revenue that the officers of Excise properly disregarded these entries, because they are not made in terms of the statute. The statute describes what particulars shall enter this book, and if these particulars are not entered then they contend that the book is not kept in terms of the Act of Parliament, and the entries so made, being disconform to the Act of Parliament, must be disregarded. The question which the Quarter Sessions have put to us in order to enable them to decide this case is, whether these entries were rightly disregarded by the Excise officers in balancing the respondents’ stock-book on the 8th and 9th of December 1879.

Now, the clauses of the Act of Parliament with which we are concerned are those which come under the general title as to “certificates and permits for the removal of spirits,” which begin with section 170 and end with section 188. That is the division of the statute in which all the sections occur that we require to construe. The 170th section provides that “every rectifier, dealer, and retailer respectively shall provide himself with a book, prepared according to a pattern to be given to him, on his application to the proper officer, and shall, on the same day on which he receives any spirits into his stock, custody, or possession, and at such time on that day as he may be requested to do so by any officer, and if not so requested, then, at latest, before the expiration of that day, write and enter in such book, and in the proper columns respectively prepared for the purpose, the date when, and the Christian and surname of the person or the name of the firm from whom and of what place the spirits were received,

No. 152.

June 22, 1881.

Yeoman v.

M'Intosh
Brothers.

No. 152.

June 22, 1881.
Yeoman v.
M'Intosh
Brothers.

the number of gallons, and the kind or quality of the spirits, and the strength thereof." And then there is a provision for entering also the spirits sent out of stock in a corresponding part of the book. Now, here it will be observed that there are certain entries imperatively required to be made—the date of receiving the spirits, the Christian and surname of the person from whom they are received, the place from which they come, the number of gallons, the kind or quality of the spirits, and the strength—and if any of these particulars are disregarded it is quite obvious that some one or more of the securities provided by the law for the collection of the revenue will be lost to the Excise officers. Now, in the present case, as I have already mentioned, there is no entry of the Christian and surname of the person, or the name of the firm, from whom the spirits were received, nor of the place from which the spirits came. To that extent, therefore, the entries are disconform to the statute. It was contended also that there was a defect, in respect that the number of the permit or certificate was not entered in the proper column. That is not expressly required by the 170th section of the statute, but it is also a very important particular of defect in the register kept in this case by the dealer, as will be seen when I proceed a little further with the clauses of the statute.

The next section which requires to be specially noticed is the 174th, which provides that "no rectifier, dealer, or retailer shall receive any spirits not accompanied by a true and lawful permit or certificate, as the same are respectively required by law"—that is, a permit in the case of spirits coming from a distiller, or a certificate in the case of spirits coming from a dealer—"and every rectifier, dealer, and retailer respectively shall immediately on receiving a permit or certificate cancel the same by writing in large letters in ink across such permit or certificate, or in the space prepared for that purpose, the word 'received,' and the day and hour when received, or shall otherwise permanently cancel such permit or certificate by lines drawn in ink across the same, so as to prevent it from being again used for the removal of spirits, and every rectifier, dealer, or retailer who shall receive any spirits without the same being accompanied by a true and lawful permit or certificate as by law required shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds; and all such spirits, or an equal quantity of spirits of a like kind, to be taken out of any part of his stock, shall also be forfeited; and every rectifier, dealer, or retailer receiving any permit or certificate, who shall not cancel the same as aforesaid, shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds." Then section 175 provides that "all permits and certificates received with spirits by a rectifier, dealer, or retailer shall be preserved after being cancelled as aforesaid, and shall be delivered by him to the officer who shall first inspect his premises after the receipt thereof; and for any neglect or default in this respect the rectifier, dealer, or retailer shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds for every such permit or certificate; but the penalty shall not be incurred if the permit or certificate has been lost or destroyed after the expiry of three months from the date thereof." Now, in connection with this I read section 183, or at least a part of it, which provides that "no rectifier or compounder or dealer shall have (except as after-mentioned) credit in stock for any greater quantity of spirits received or found therein than for the quantity computed at proof brought in with such permit or certificate as aforesaid delivered to the officer." The words within parenthesis—"except as after-mentioned"—have not been shewn to introduce any exception which can apply to the present case; and therefore we have here a distinct provision that a dealer is not to have credit in stock for any greater quantity of spirits received or found therein than for the quantity brought in with the permit or certificate which has been delivered to the officer in terms of section 175, which I have just read.

This section brings into the present case the want of a permit or certificate as a very important part of the consideration upon which we are to determine whether the entries in question were properly disregarded by the Excise officers. According to section 183 the Excise officers are expressly debarred from giving credit in computing the stock for any spirits that are not brought in with the permit or certificate which has been received along with them and duly cancelled, and thereafter handed to the officers of Excise. Then, by section 176 (to go back again), which is the one that more especially relates to the prosecution in this case, it is provided—"Any officer may at any time take an account of the quantity of all spirits in the stock or possession of a dealer or retailer, and if it be found that the quantity of spirits remaining in the stock or possession of such dealer or retailer exceeds the quantity which ought to be therein, as appears on balancing the book by this Act directed to be kept by him of spirits received into and sent out of his stock or possession (all spirits being for that purpose computed at proof), the excess shall be deemed to be spirits illegally received; and a quantity of spirits equal to such excess shall be forfeited, and may be seized by any officer out of any part of the stock of such dealer or retailer, who shall also forfeit the sum of twenty shillings for every gallon of such excess; and it shall also be lawful for any officer to enter into the premises of a dealer or retailer, and to examine and take samples of any spirits in his stock or possession, paying for such samples the usual price thereof." Now, the officers of Excise in this case found entries of spirits in this book with no particulars as to the party from whom they were received, or the place from which they came, and without any permit or certificate applicable to those spirits, and it appears to me therefore that under the provisions of these various clauses they had no alternative but to disregard the entries of those spirits in the stock-book, and that being so, of course the excess is brought out as stated in the case.

But there remains for consideration the point regarding the samples, which stands in a different position from the spirits recovered by grogging. There is nothing at all in the Excise Statutes about samples, so far as I can see. There are no statutory provisions or regulations as to samples. But the Commissioners of Excise authorise the giving to dealers of samples of spirits in bond, and they give samples of certain amounts, generally samples of three gills, which certainly is not a very great amount, but apparently a dealer is entitled to have two samples of such amount from each cask of spirits which he has in bond. These samples do not pay duty, and they go into the dealer's possession without a permit or certificate. Now, there is no authority for that in the statute, and the Commissioners of Excise, therefore, in dealing with this matter, are going beyond the statute. They are giving to dealers spirits which do not pay duty—taking spirits out of bond and delivering them to him without exacting duty—and they are also allowing him to obtain possession of those spirits without permit or certificate. I do not see how, in these circumstances, the Commissioners of Excise can fall back upon the statutes, and say, in regard to these quantities of spirits—"You shall not take these into your stock." The dealer is just following the example of the Commissioners in violating or disregarding the statute. The

No. 152.

June 22, 1881.

Yeoman v.

M'Intosh
Brothers.

No. 152.

June 22, 1881.
Yeoman v.
M'Intosh
Brothers.

Commissioners of Excise say—"These spirits are delivered to you as a matter of indulgence and for a special purpose, and you have no right to put them into your stock." Well, if that is so, they certainly ought to have made some very express or special provision in the regulations about giving out samples, and about the disposal of the samples if they are not used or consumed as samples. But they do not appear to have done that; and certainly one would suppose that the most natural course for a dealer, if he has got samples to a greater extent than he finds he has use for in dealing with his customers, is just to put them into his general stock. I cannot say I think it possible to allow the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to recover penalties, or in any way to prosecute in respect of these spirits being found in the possession, or, in other words, in the stock, of the dealer, in excess of what is brought there under a lawful permit or certificate, and in compliance with all the regulations of the statute, when the fact that they are there under these conditions is attributable to the action of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue themselves.

Therefore, while I am for answering the question put to us in the affirmative as regards the spirits obtained by means of grogging, I think we must answer the other part of it as regards the samples in the negative.

LORD DEAS.—This question of grogging arose before us on a previous occasion in a somewhat different form. I was then disposed to think that the officers of Excise were bound to recognise the entries which were made of such spirits; but the very lucid statement made by the counsel for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue upon this case satisfied me that if that were the sound construction of the statute the Revenue would be exposed to dangers in not getting the proper duty—so very great that it is very difficult to think that that is the right construction of the statute. I am now satisfied—while I retain my opinion that grogging is a perfectly lawful process—that the regulations as to the entries in the books are all necessary for the fair protection of the Government in recovering the duties, and that as such they are imperative upon the dealer. I now think further that, when they are not observed, the officers of the Revenue are entitled to disregard the entries. On that point, therefore, I agree with the explanation of the rule of law given by your Lordship. Upon the matter of samples, I have had no hesitation in agreeing with your Lordship.

LORD MURE.—The question here put is as to the competency of the officers of Excise disregarding certain entries which they found in the stock-book of the respondents when they were checking that book in terms of the 176th section of the statute; and whether they were at their own hand entitled to refuse to give effect to the entries of certain quantities of spirits that were there entered. These entries related to different things, and are made under different names, viz., as "Casks" with "Grog" in them, or as "Samples" of spirits. Your Lordship has pointed out that the permit column is blank, and that in the column for the name of the person or firm from whom the spirits were received there are entries of a certain number of casks by number, and that a certain number of samples of spirits are entered; and that there is brought out in another column what the quantity is in each of the casks. But there is, on the other hand, no entry of the name or surname of the firm from whom the spirits were received. Now, in these circumstances, it is not necessary, in my view of the case, to enter into any question as to the legality of this process of grogging. No. 152. It is conceded on the part of the Excise that if the trader simply puts water into a cask which had been for some time in his own premises, and for the spirits on which he had paid duty, and extracts by that process a quantity of spirit from the wood—and there is a letter from Mr Young, the secretary, to this effect—they would not challenge such a proceeding. But with reference to casks purchased by a trader—and, for anything we can see, all the casks here entered may have been so obtained—the Excise say that the trader is not entitled to make use of this process of grogging so as to get spirits out of the wood of those casks. I do not, however, think it necessary to express any opinion on that matter. The case we are called upon to deal with is under the 170th section, and is that of a book in which certain casks are entered which are said to contain grog, but there is no entry of the name or surname of the person or firm from whom the cask has been obtained, and where the express enactment of the Act of Parliament to that effect is not complied with. In this state of matters, the officers of Excise disregarded all those entries, and the question is whether that was within their power. And having regard to the fact (which is admitted) that there was no permit or certificate sent or received with these casks, I am of opinion that the officers were entitled to deal with those casks as cases where the statute had been violated, in respect that they were taken into possession without a permit or certificate, and that it was the duty of the officers to disregard the entries. On that ground, and apart from the question raised as to the effect of an omission to enter the names of the firm, I agree with your Lordships; and I also agree with your Lordships in regard to the samples, which I think are not struck at by the statute, as it makes no provision with regard to them.

June 22, 1881.
Yeoman v.
M'Intosh
Brothers.

LORD SHAND.—In the former case before this Court the question arose in these circumstances: There had been a quantity of spirits received in the wood of casks and extracted from the wood, but no entries relating to these spirits had been made in the book of the retailer or dealer, and, in consequence, on balancing the stock, there was an excess found on the premises beyond what the book shewed. I was of opinion, with your Lordship, that the excess was clearly stock which might have been forfeited, and in respect of each gallon of which the Crown was entitled to penalties, and for the simple reason that there was no record of that stock in the book as required by the Act of Parliament.

The question in this case arises in a somewhat different way, as your Lordship has pointed out. The dealer has made certain entries in his book of the stock which was received by him in the wood of casks and extracted or recovered, and the question is, whether, having made the entries in the way in which he has thought fit to do, he is now in a position to maintain successfully that he is not liable in any penalties. I have come to the conclusion, with your Lordships, that the case is one in which the Crown is entitled to the penalty. In the first place, it is clear that the retailer or dealer is bound, in compliance with the provisions of section 170 of the statute, to record in the book which is given to him for the purpose by the officers of Excise the Christian and surname of the person or firm from whom he receives the spirits, and the place from which such spirits are received. In regard to all of the spirits with which we have here to do we find that these particulars are entirely omitted, and it appears to me that

No. 152.

June 22, 1881.
Yeoman v.
M'Intosh
Brothers.

as in this way certain of the statutory requisites provided as a safeguard and a means of checking the transit of spirits from one dealer to another were omitted in the book the officers were entitled to disregard the entries. The case is not one in which an accidental omission here and there of a date or of particulars as to a person or place occurs. It is a case in regard to which this provision of the statute is systematically disregarded, and intentionally so; and that being so, it appears to me the officers were entitled to say—"We cannot take those entries as entries in compliance with the statute, and we disregard them, and we balance your book without them."

In the next place, there is a view which has been adverted to by your Lordship, and which I am of opinion leads to the same result—I mean the provision rendering permits or certificates necessary. The statute does not prescribe that in the book a record of each permit or certificate shall be kept, but it certainly provides, taking section 174 with sections 183 and 184, that no dealer or retailer shall receive spirits into his premises, at least exceeding one gallon at a time in quantity, without a permit or certificate with such spirits. Now, on turning to the entries which are here recorded under 31st October and 17th November, it appears that upon each of those dates casks containing much more than one gallon of spirits were received into stock at one and the same time. That being so, it appears to me that the concluding words of the 183d section apply to this case,—in short, that a permit or certificate is essential, at least where the quantity of spirits received exceeds one gallon, before the dealer can obtain credit for it in his stock.

In regard to the samples, I agree in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. I am not satisfied, however, that the Commissioners of Excise or the officers of Excise go beyond what they are entitled to do in giving out these samples. But then, because quantities of less than one gallon are received, that is no reason why they should not be entered in the dealer's book. The trader, if he gets a number of samples, is bound to enter the spirits he receives. I see no exception in the case of samples or anything else. They go into his premises and into his stock, and he is bound to put them into his book, and if they are in his book he is entitled to get credit for them. I am therefore of opinion that the officers of Excise were bound to credit those samples, which were properly entered, and upon that ground I think they were not entitled to disregard the entries.

THE COURT gave answer that they "are of opinion that of the 2220 entries disregarded by the Excise officers in balancing the respondents' books on 8th and 9th December 1879, those which apply to spirits obtained by the operation of grogging were rightly disregarded, but that those entries which apply to spirits delivered by the Excise officers to the respondents as samples were not rightly disregarded, and direct the said Justices in Quarter Sessions accordingly."

DAVID CROLE, Solicitor of Inland Revenue—W. G. ROY, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN LINN, Pursuer.—Rhind—Millie.
G. D. CASADINOS, Defender.—Kennedy.

No. 153.

June 24, 1881.

Linn v.
Casadinos.

Jurisdiction—Forum of person who has no domicile.—A travelling merchant informed a person in Scarborough, from whom he ordered goods, that he had no fixed residence, but travelled, in pursuance of his business, all over the United Kingdom. The goods were delivered, some in England, some in Scotland. The purchaser having failed to pay the purchase-money, the seller brought an action against him in Scotland, where he happened to be on business. He had not been forty days in Scotland when the summons was served. Held that, in the circumstances, the Scotch Courts had jurisdiction, the defender's forum being wherever he might chance to be for the time.

In November 1880 John Linn, carver and gilder, Scarborough, raised an action against G. D. Casadinos, "picture-dealer, Edinburgh and Aberdeen," concluding for payment of £102, 9s., being the amount alleged to be due by him for picture frames, drawings, &c., supplied to him by the pursuer.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.

The pursuer stated,—(Cond. 1) "The defender is a travelling dealer going from town to town in the United Kingdom, and at the raising of the action was carrying on business in Edinburgh and Aberdeen, and not at Manchester as stated originally in his defences. It is believed and averred that he was at least forty days in Scotland previously, and was, on that ground (apart from others), subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session when the present action was raised and served."

The defender answered,—“Admitted that the pursuer is a carver and gilder in Scarborough, and that the defender is a dealer in pictures. Explained that the defender is erroneously designed in the summons as ‘picture-dealer in Edinburgh and Aberdeen.’ He is a domiciled Englishman, resident at Mr Tallent’s, North Road, Clayton, Manchester, to which address all business letters to him are sent. Till 20th October last he had a place of business at Scarborough, No. 36 Westborough. He has no office or place of business in Scotland. The contracts of sale and employment on which this action is raised were entered into, as explained below, in England. The defender was personally cited at Aberdeen on November 29, 1880, while there on a transient visit. Denied that the defender had been forty days in Scotland when the present action was served on him. No arrestments to found jurisdiction had been used against him, and, in these circumstances, he is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court.”

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The defender being a travelling merchant, representing himself to have no fixed residence, and having been personally cited in Scotland, is liable to the jurisdiction of its Courts. (4) In the whole circumstances of the case the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and decree against him should be pronounced as concluded for.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The domicile of the defender, and the locus contractus, being in England, the Court of Session is not the competent or convenient forum for trial of the present action, and the action should therefore be dismissed, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof before answer on the question of jurisdiction and on the merits.

Proof having been led, the Lord Ordinary (Lord Curriehill), on 25th May 1881, repelled the defender’s plea of want of jurisdiction.*

* “NOTE.— . . . In these circumstances it appears to me to be hopeless for the defender to maintain that, owing to his non-residence in Scotland for forty

No. 153.

June 24, 1881.
Linn v.
Casadinos.

The evidence on that question was summed up in the Lord Ordinary's note as follows:—“(1) That the defender, who is a Greek by birth, but has resided in Great Britain for fifteen years, came to Scarborough on 20th August 1880, and became tenant of business premises there, which he occupied till 23d October; (2) that in September and October, while still occupying these premises, he ordered from the pursuer the picture frames which form the subject of this action, viz., thirty-six in September and twelve in October; (3) that most of the frames were delivered to the defender in Scarborough, the remainder having been at his request forwarded to him by railway to Glasgow in the end of October or beginning of November; (4) that while the defender alleges in the record, and repeated in the witness-box, that his residence was, at the date of the action, at Mr Tallent's, North Road, Clayton, Manchester, he has failed to prove that statement by any evidence other than his own statement. He has not called any witnesses to prove that he ever resided in Manchester, or that they sent letters to him there as his headquarters. His name does not appear to be in any directory; and what is still more remarkable is the fact that although Mr Tallent's son is the defender's assistant in his business, and was examined by him as a witness at the proof, the defender carefully abstained from putting any question as to the alleged residence in Manchester; (5) that, on the other hand, it is proved by the evidence of the pursuer, and William Brown Serman, that when in Scarborough the defender gave out to both of these persons that he had no fixed abode, but travelled about the country on business, and that his address was the place wherever he happened to be for the time; (6) that the defender, after receiving the pursuer's frames, put pictures in them, and exposed them to sale by auction in various towns in the month of November 1880, and, inter alia, in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Aberdeen, and that when he reached Aberdeen he had still in his possession nearly all of the said frames; (7) that he advertised the whole of said frames then in his possession for sale in Aberdeen by public auction, and that days before citation, this Court has no jurisdiction to try the action. The defender is a foreigner by birth, not naturalised, and he has not, and is not proved to have ever had any known domicile, residence, or place of business, in any part of the United Kingdom. He is just a travelling merchant, and he goes to the pursuer in Scarborough and holds himself out as having no fixed place of abode, and indeed as having no house but the place where he may happen to be for the time. He then buys frames from the pursuer for the purpose of taking them about the country and selling them by auction along with the pictures which they are to hold; he gets some of them before he leaves Scarborough, and directs the rest to be sent to Scotland, and finally he takes the whole, or nearly the whole, to Aberdeen, where he is proceeding to sell them when this action for the price is raised against him. If not in Aberdeen, I fail to see where the pursuer could have sued him, unless at some other place of sale where he might have the chance to find him; and it would be most unjust to hold that, in circumstances like the present, the Courts of Scotland have no jurisdiction over the defender in respect he had not resided in Scotland for forty days before citation. If authority be required it will be found in Ersk. (I. ii. sec. 16), who says,—‘and if, on the other hand, one be engaged in such a way of life as to have no fixed residence, ex gr. a soldier or a travelling merchant, a personal citation against him is sufficient to establish jurisdiction over him in the Judge of that territory where he was cited.’—Lees, 12th November 1709, M. 4791. See also the case M'Niven, 14th February 1834, 12 Sh. 453. That doctrine is consistent alike with common justice and with common sense, and I am therefore of opinion that the plea of ‘forum non competens’ must be repelled, and I can see no ground for holding this Court to be ‘forum non conveniens.’” while in Aberdeen, in connection with said sale, the summons in this action was personally served upon him; and (8) that at the date of that citation he had not resided forty days in Scotland."

No. 153.
June 24, 1881.
Linn v.
Casadino.

The case was then ordered to the roll that parties might be heard on the merits, and on 28th May the Lord Ordinary repelled the defences, and decerned against the defender for £98.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—There were only three ways in which jurisdiction could be founded—ratione domicilii, rei sitæ, and loci contractus. None of these elements was present in this case. Under the provisions of the Judicature Act (sec. 175) and relative rules, the defender might have been sued in England, where the contract was made,¹ and not only in Aberdeen, as stated by the Lord Ordinary. This case was not ruled by that of Lees v. Parlane, 1709, M. 4791, cited by the Lord Ordinary, as that was decided on the ground that every soldier had a necessary domicile—i.e., the headquarters of his regiment. In the case of M. Niven, also cited by the Lord Ordinary, the defender was sued in the place where the contract was entered into.²

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have had a long argument on the jurisdiction, but, in the particular circumstances, I have no doubt upon the matter. I do not think that the facts even raise the general question, for I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and indeed it is hardly denied, that when these goods were ordered at Scarborough the defender told the pursuer that he had no fixed residence, and that his residence was just where he might be for the time. The defender did not say then, and he has not now proved, that he had any residence in Manchester. In these circumstances, where was the creditor to look for his money? He simply had to follow his debtor; he could do nothing else. I am of opinion that where such a debtor, one who has no domicile and no fixed residence, resides for the time, there is his forum. There is no mention on record about the law of England; but even if it had been pleaded, I do not think it would have applied. The creditor was obliged to come to the temporary residence of his debtor to get his money. On these grounds I think the objection to jurisdiction should be repelled.

(On the merits his Lordship concurred with the Lord Ordinary.)

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

WILLIAM SPINK, S.S.C.—JOHN MACPHERSON, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT SCOTT, Pursuer (Respondent).—R. V. Campbell—Baxter.
AGNES SCOTT, Defender (Appellant).—Mackintosh—Dickson.

No. 154.

June 28, 1881.
Scott v. Scott.

Property—River—Nuisance—Interdict.—Where A feued part of his ground for the erection of dwelling-houses, and gave the feuars right to send sewage through a drain passing through the remainder of his ground into an ordinary field drain which communicated with an open ditch on an adjoining property belonging to B, held that B was entitled to interdict against A discharging the sewage into the said ditch.

¹ Westlake's Private International Law, p. 206.

² Kermick v. Watson, July 7, 1871, 9 Macph. 984, 43 Scot. Jur. 542.

No. 154.

June 28, 1881.
Scott v. Scott.2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ROBERT SCOTT, the pursuer of this action, was proprietor of parts of the lands of Wester Daldowie and Boghall, situated on the south side of the turnpike road from Glasgow to Hamilton.

Mrs Agnes Scott, the defender, was proprietrix of certain other parts of the same lands, situated on the opposite or north side of the turnpike road, and also on the south side of the said road adjacent to and to the east of the pursuer's property.

The defender had laid out her ground on the north side of the road for feuing on a general plan, and in connection therewith had formed a common drain, to the use of which her feuars had right by their titles. This drain was led across the turnpike road, and into the defender's ground on the south side of the road, where it discharged into an existing closed field drain, also on her ground, but the continuation of which was an open ditch, partly on the pursuer's property and partly the march between his property and adjacent property belonging to Wallace's trustees.

In this open ditch there was no continuous run of water. It was made for the purpose of draining the adjoining fields, but contained water sufficient for watering cattle, for which purpose it had been used by the pursuer and his tenants till a period within ten years of the defender's operations complained of. Its disuse was accounted for by the introduction of a gravitation water supply from the Airdrie water-works, but there was evidence to the effect that a certain amount of pollution, though not from water-closet sewage, was allowed to enter the ditch within the pursuer's own property.

The natural lie of the ground did not lead the surface water of the defender's property on the north side of the turnpike road in the line of the above-mentioned drain and ditch. A considerable cutting had to be made in order to carry the drain in question under the road into the defender's ground on the south side.

The pursuer, complaining that a nuisance would be occasioned to him, raised this action in the Sheriff Court at Airdrie to interdict the defender discharging sewage from any houses erected on her ground into any drain or drains situated wholly or partly on his property.

Notwithstanding interim interdict being granted the defender completed her operations, after which the water in the ditch within the pursuer's ground was sensibly polluted with water-closet sewage, and rendered unfit for any use whatever.

In defence the defender pleaded;—(2) Said ditch, which is the natural receptacle and vehicle of the defender's sewage, has from time immemorial been used by the pursuer and others as a common sewer. (3) Any sewage from the defender's lands would not appreciably affect the ditch or change its character.

The Sheriff-substitute (Mair) after proof, the import of which is given above, and in the note to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, declared the interim interdict formerly granted perpetual.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The question therefore arises whether the defender is entitled to discharge the sewage from the houses erected or to be erected on her lands into or through any drain wholly or partly on the pursuer's lands. I have no difficulty in answering this question in the negative, and in doing so I may state at once that I can see no distinction in principle between this case and the cases of Montgomery and Fleming v. Findlay, 9th July 1853, 15 D. 853, and The Caledonian Railway Company v. Baird, 14th June 1876, 3 Rettie, 839. The rubric in the first of these cases is as follows:—'A proprietor erected upon his lands dwelling-houses, into which he introduced water by pipes from a water company's works, and by means of drains conveyed the sewage water into a streamlet which passed through a subjacent property. Held that whatever right the proprietor

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.¹

After hearing counsel, the Court continued the case for some weeks to allow of an arrangement being come to between the parties, but this having failed, it was again put to the roll.

LORD YOUNG.—We have allowed this case to stand over, not from any doubt as to the facts, or the law applicable to them, but to enable the parties to effect an arrangement for the drainage of their properties which would be to their common advantage, and of which there seemed to be a reasonable prospect. The attempts which have been made have failed, and we must now decide the case as it is presented to us.

The facts are within narrow compass. The appellant feued certain portions of her property for building, and four dwelling-houses have been erected on them. To accommodate the feuars she has constructed on her property, outside the limits of the feus, a common sewer or drain, into which they are authorised and invited by their titles to convey the sewage from their houses. This sewer or drain is made to open and discharge itself into an open ditch or water-run, running for some distance between the properties of the appellant and respondent, and there-might have to lead into the streamlet the ordinary surface water arising from his lands, he had no right to discharge therein sewage water, and interdict granted against his discharging or permitting to be discharged such sewage or waste water upon the lands of the subjacent proprietor.'

"It is not and cannot be disputed in the present case that the sewage from the houses erected and to be erected on the defender's lands will be discharged into drains wholly or partly on the pursuer's lands, but it was attempted to be proved by the defender that these drains were in themselves common sewers, and that the pursuer would not suffer in any way by the sewage from her lands being discharged into them; and it was contended for her that she was so entitled to discharge the sewage, she being in the position of an upper, and the pursuer being in the position of a lower, heritor. . . .

"I am not satisfied, therefore, that the pursuer is in the position of a lower heritor to the defender, at least so far as the houses already erected on the defender's lands are concerned. If the pursuer is not in that position the defender has no rights whatever affecting the pursuer's lands.

"But even assuming that the pursuer is in the position of a lower heritor to the defender he is only bound to receive the surface water from the lands of the latter; if, however, it had been proved that the drains, wholly or partly on the pursuer's lands, were, in fact, common sewers, he would probably not have been entitled to complain of the defender making use of them in the same way. So far, however, from that being proved, I am of opinion that the contrary has been established. The only evidence led by the defender was, that the water in the drains on the pursuer's lands was occasionally polluted in consequence of soap suds and dirty water having been sent into them from some miners' houses and the Boghall farm-house, all situated on the north side of the turnpike road. No water-closet sewage, however, was discharged into them. The evidence for the pursuer, on the other hand, shews clearly that the water in these drains or ditches on his lands was used by man and beast for drinking purposes till a period within the last ten years. Even although the water in these ditches or drains was occasionally dirty or polluted the defender was not entitled to make it worse, and there can be no doubt that the discharge of sewage from inhabited houses would have this effect. That the water in these ditches or drains is now unfit for primary purposes, and is a nuisance, in consequence of the defender's operations, has, in my opinion, been established."

¹ Authorities.—Cases referred to by the Sheriff-substitute, and Attorney-General v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, Dec. 22, 1868, L. R., 4 Ch. App., 146.

No. 154.
June 28, 1881.
Scott v. Scott.

after between the property of the respondent and Wallace's trustees, who are not here represented. It is not disputed, or at least is, in our opinion, not doubtful, that the respondent has a proprietary interest in this ditch or water-run, and is entitled to the use of it for watering his cattle, and that it has, in fact, been so used by him and his predecessors in title. The appellant's feuars have used, and are now using, the common sewer for the purpose for which it was intended, and, in fact, constructed by the appellant, and the consequence is that the sewage from their houses is thereby discharged into the ditch or water-run, which, we agree with the Sheriff in thinking, is thereby polluted to such an extent as to render the water in it unfit for use as formerly, and to create a nuisance. The appellant is not responsible for what is done by the feuars within their own property, or even on her's, without her aid or authority. But, having given them permission to discharge their sewage on to her property outside their feus, she is not entitled to convey it therefrom into the water-run in question to the nuisance of her neighbour, the respondent, and, having done so, we are of opinion that the respondent's complaint is well founded, and that he is entitled to have the continuance of the nuisance restrained by interdict. It is, we think, immaterial from whence the sewage reached the appellant's property. She voluntarily, and apparently by contract, receives it there, and from thence, by a work of her own construction, discharges it, illegally as we think, into the water-run in which the respondent is interested. The findings in fact in the Sheriff's interlocutor seem to us to be supported by the evidence, and the interdict thereby granted is within the respondent's right, for, as already observed, the appellant is not entitled to create a nuisance to the respondent by discharging sewage from her lands where-soever the original source of it may be.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This question appears to me to be foreclosed by the decisions of the Court in the cases of Montgomery and Fleming v. Findlay, 9th July 1853, 15 D., 853; and The Caledonian Railway Company v. Baird & Co., 14th June 1876, 3 Rettie, 839. In the former the facts were that the proprietor had erected upon his lands dwelling-houses, into which he introduced water-pipes from the water company's works, and by means of the drains conveyed sewage water into a streamlet which passed through a subjacent property; and on these facts the Court held that whatever right the proprietor might have to lead into the streamlet the ordinary surface water arising from his lands, he had no right to discharge drainage and sewage water; and interdict against such discharge was consequently granted. The only distinction attempted to be made betwixt that case and the present was, that in the former the place into which the sewage was discharged was a streamlet, whereas here, according to the contention of the appellant, the place into which the drainage is to be discharged is only a dry ditch. Such a distinction appears to me to be no warrant for a difference in the judgment that ought to be pronounced. If anything, the present case appears to me to be worse than the case with which the Court had to deal in Montgomery and Fleming v. Findlay. The nuisance created by the discharge of sewage into a dry ditch must, as regards the lands of the respondent, be even a greater nuisance than it would have been if the discharge had been made into a streamlet, greater or less, by which, in whole or in part, the sewage constituting the nuisance would have been carried sooner or later away from the respondent's property. I entertain no doubt of the applicability of the cases referred to as precedents on the present occasion, and therefore concur in thinking that the interlocutor appealed against ought to be affirmed. No. 154.

June 28, 1881.
Scott v. Scott.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

ALEXANDER WYLIE, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES MURDOCH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Keir.

SAMUEL WALLACE, Defender (Appellant).—Macdonald—Jameson.

No. 155.

June 28, 1881.
Murdoch v.
Wallace.

River—Burn—Alteration of course—Mora.—The tenant of a farm at the commencement of a nineteen years lease diverted for drainage purposes the water of a small burn which followed a circuitous course through his farm into a straight channel which joined the original watercourse at right angles to it just before it entered B, an adjoining property. The tenant raised an embankment opposite the junction to prevent the water overflowing upon the lower part of his farm. The effect of his operations was, in time of flood, to throw gravel on two acres of pasture ground on B.

The proprietor of B objected to the operations when executed, but took no proceedings until the last year of the lease, when he raised an action concluding to have the tenant ordained to restore the burn to its former course, and for damages. Held that, in the circumstances, the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

SAMUEL WALLACE became tenant of the farm of Nether Monybuie, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, at the term of Whitsunday 1861, under a nineteen years' lease. The farm was bounded on the south-east and partly on the south by the lands of Drumwhirn, the property of James Murdoch, Esq. Part of these lands were on a lower level than Wallace's farm.

When Wallace entered on the farm the Monybuie Burn ran in a circuitous course through part of his land; it then crossed into the lands of Drumwhirn, where it continued its windings. The natural drainage of the upper part of Drumwhirn flowed into this burn before it reached Monybuie.

In 1862, Wallace, finding that, owing to its windings, the bed of the stream was not large enough to carry off the water in times of flood, and therefore flooded parts of his lands, constructed an artificial cut from a point on his own lands, and carried it in a straight line to the place where the stream crossed the march to Drumwhirn. The new channel joined the original watercourse at right angles to it, and Wallace constructed on the opposite side of the stream, in his own lands, an embankment to prevent the water overflowing on to his meadows.

After these operations were carried out Wallace wrote to Mr Murdoch in these terms:—"May 6, 1862. Sir,—I had a message from you through John Henderson last night that I cannot well understand, concerning the main drain that I made, which comes out of Minnybuie into your land. I made an offer to you through Henderson some time ago to continue that cut down through your property, so far as would have prevented the sanding up of your land, which you refused. But I still wish to do so, and trust you will now grant me permission; it will be a great advantage to your property, and likewise to Monybuie."

To this the following answer was returned by Mr Murdoch's factor:—"17th June 1862. Sir,—I saw Mr Murdoch of Drumwhirn yesterday, whose lands have been materially injured by some of your late operations, and he is wishful that the damages he has sustained should be settled, and he desires me to say that he is ready to submit their amount to

No. 155. arbiters mutually chosen, or to an oversman to be named by them in case they disagree in opinion."

June 28, 1881.
Murdoch v.
Wallace.

Mr Wallace refused to enter into an arbitration, and on 30th June 1862 Mr Murdoch intimated to him by letter that unless he consented to a reference an action for damages would be raised against him. On 30th July 1862 Mr Murdoch intimated by letter that he had had the damage done to his land valued, and had put the matter into the hands of his man of business.

No action was at that time raised, and no further communications about the matter took place between the parties till 11th September 1877, when the pursuer wrote a letter to the defender about it.

In December 1879, when Wallace's lease was coming to an end, Mr Murdoch presented a petition against Wallace in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, praying the Court—" First, to interdict the defender, and all others having his authority, from interfering with the channel of the original burn or watercourse running near to the march fence between the said lands of Nether Minnybuie and Drumwhirn, and near to where said burn or watercourse enters the said lands of Drumwhirn at the point C, as shewn on the sketch herewith produced and referred to. Second, to ordain the defender forthwith to remove or fill up a new burn or watercourse made near to said original burn or watercourse, and nearer to the said march fence, whereby the water is diverted from the channel of the original burn or watercourse, and also to remove an embankment made by him at the end of the said new burn or watercourse at the said point C on said sketch where the same enters the said lands of Drumwhirn, and to clear out the said original channel, the said new burn or watercourse and embankment having been improperly and illegally made by the defender in or about the beginning of the year 1862; and failing his doing so within eight days, to ordain the same to be done at the sight of a person to be appointed by the Court, and to ordain the defender to pay the expenses thereby incurred. Third, to grant decree against the defender, ordaining him to pay to the pursuer the sum of £137, or such sum as may be found due, as the injury and damage done to the lands of Drumwhirn, the property of the pursuer, by the overflow of water and sand upon the said lands by in consequence of the said improper and illegal operations of the defender."

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—3. The pursuer is barred by acquiescence and mora from insisting in the present action. 4. Interdict ought to be refused, in respect that the operations complained of having been completed and in use for seventeen years, an action of interdict is inappropriate and incompetent. 5. The whole prayer of the petition ought to be refused, with expenses, in respect (1) that the operations complained of have been carried out on lands not belonging to the pursuer; (2) that the said operations have been carried out by the defender in the legitimate exercise of his own and his landlord's rights, for the agricultural improvement of his farm, and not in emulationem vicini; (3) that the natural outfall of the water on to the pursuer's lands has not been altered, and the defender is entitled to send down to the lands of the pursuer, as inferior proprietor, all natural surface water set free in the course of legitimate agricultural improvements.

A proof was led.*

* The nature of the defender's operations may be gathered from the evidence of the following witnesses:—

"ROBERT WAUGH, shepherd, Drumquhirn, a witness for the pursuer, deponed—I am about sixty years of age, and have been here as shepherd about fourteen years.

On 29th January the Sheriff-substitute (Nicholson) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the Minnybuie burn, which flows

No. 155.
June 28, 1881.
Murdoch v.
Wallace.

I have known Minnybuie and Drumquhirn for more than forty years. The boundary between them in my first recollection was a weat bit ruckle dyke, but it's made a new dyke since. There was a burn running between the two lands. I remember the channel being changed, but not the year. It was changed by defender. Before that change was made we used to have hay on the Drumquhirn side. I mind our having some years eight, some years ten ricks. After the channel was changed there was no more hay mown there, because it got all spoiled with glaur and stones. Each of these ricks of hay would be worth about 10s. I suppose. There was undoubtedly a loss of hay there every year to the amount of about £4. As shepherd on Drumquhirn I have to keep the sheep from feeding there, because the sand mixed with the grass rots them. About two acres are totally spoiled in that way, at least I would rather want it as hae't. The cows pasture on the remainder. These two acres yielded capital good hay formerly. I wasn't here when the present march-dyke was made. The water of the burn flows through that dyke in a flood on to Drumquhirn, and even when it's no great flood. The embankment raised by the defender is the main thing that spoils our side. If it hadn't been made the overflow would go on Minnybuie side. Cross-examined.—I remember Macmillan being tenant of Minnybuie; defender succeeded him. The Drumquhirn land was sometimes flooded then where there was a big flood. The hay was some years got off without any flooding. There was no embankment in Macmillan's time. If defender hadn't made the embankment his lower meadow would sometimes get flooded. If that embankment were not there a new channel cut from that point on the Drumquhirn side would prevent flooding, but the embankment sends the water in the direction of the Drumquhirn meadow. The old burn course didn't throw the shingle on to Drumquhirn that I can recollect. I saw the new channel soon after it was made. It was in a good state, six or eight feet wide, and three or four feet deep, but it soon got filled with sand. If it had been kept aye clear the burn wouldn't have spoiled the land above the bridge so much. The new channel was wider than the old one.

"ALEXANDER M'MICHAEL, land-surveyor, Castle-Douglas, a witness for the pursuer, deponed, In June 1879 I visited the lands of Drumquhirn. The new channel was silted up three-fourths with gravel. I also examined the embankment shewn on the plan at C—(on plan prepared by this witness). The old water slap was at C, and the burn coming in its old course flowed straight on into Drumquhirn lands at that point. The water coming down the new channel drives against the embankment, and then passes into Drumquhirn. It does not flow so directly into Drumquhirn as it did before. I examined the march-dyke and the lands on Drumquhirn side from B to C. The channel being so largely filled up with gravel is insufficient to hold the whole water of the burn, which in case of flood flows through the march-dyke on to Drumquhirn. I found land on the Drumquhirn side to the extent of 2 acres 1 rood and 20 poles injured by the flooding and gravel. . . . I estimated the yearly loss sustained from these causes by the pursuer, in company with Mr M'Cormick, at £1, 10s. per acre. We estimated the damage caused by the risk of injury to the pursuer's sheep from the grass growing on these lands at £5 a-year. In my opinion that damage will increase so long as the burn is allowed to run in the channel in its present state. Cross-examined.—The cause of the overflow on the Drumquhirn lands is the want of a sufficient outlet for the water from the present state of the channel, which is worse than if there were none. If the new channel had been kept clear I think it would have sufficed for the purpose for which it was made. . . . The old channel of the burn on the Drumquhirn side below C has been filled up with the gravel from the Minnybuie side. The embankment tended to send the gravel on to that side.

"JAMES BARBOUR, engineer, Dumfries, a witness for defender, deponed,—I examined that ground about the end of last year. The channel of the burn made by defender is marked red, A and B (on a plan prepared by the witness, B being the lower end). It extends about 300 yards. The average width is

No. 155. partly through the defender's and partly through the pursuer's lands, had frequently done damage by overflowing on both sides, for want of a suffi-

June 28, 1881.

Murdoch v.
Wallace.

ten feet. It appeared to me a channel that would be sufficient to carry away all the ordinary flow of the burn. I examined the old channel. It was to a large extent silted up. I examined the Drumquhirn lands from the point where the burn enters from the new channel down to the bridge. The channel of the burn on that side is very crooked, and about half the breadth of the upper channel. The mouth of that lower portion of the burn was silted up, and its channel would, in my opinion, be too small to carry away the water of the burn in case of flood. I examined the upper portion of the burn on the Drumquhirn side" (the plan shewed that above the point A, the opening of the new channel, the burn flowed partly over the lands of Drumquhirn), "and found that above the point A there are steep banks without any protection, from which shingle is carried down into the burn, and deposited on the lands between A and B, which are nearly level. The quantity of shingle is considerably increased by drainage on both sides, the under strata being in a great measure shingle. The old channel on the Minnybuie side could not have been sufficient to carry away that shingle in times of flood. The want of sufficient outlet for the water from the new channel is one of the causes of the deposit of shingle on the Drumquhirn side. The shingle will always be deposited more or less by floods on level ground, but the curves and windings of the channel on the Drumquhirn side tend to increase that deposit. There is a small stream marked C on the Drumquhirn side. The effect of the new channel is to carry away the water of that stream, or rather, it has tended to prevent the flooding of that stream. . . . Cross-examined.—I examined the lands on the Drumquhirn side, and found a deposit of gravel at the point B. It came from the higher reaches of the burn. I suppose that deposit would injure the Drumquhirn land. I can form no estimate of the damage.

"DEFENDER deponed,—On my entry I carried on extensive drainage operations on the farm. A considerable portion of that drainage goes into the Minnybuie burn. The land was very wet on both sides of the part where the new channel runs when I entered the farm. The old channel of the burn was not fit to carry away the flow of water into it. I could not get the use of that land unless the channel were deepened or a new one made. I had meetings with the pursuer, and with one of the Messrs Dickson" (the proprietors of the defender's farm), "in regard to the carrying away of the water below the bridge. They and I agreed to cut a new channel for the burn below the bridge. John Henderson acted at that time for the Messrs Dickson. He was the medium of communication between them and the pursuer. He is now dead. After the new channel below the bridge was made I made the new one on my own side above that. I believe that was done in 1862. I understood from Henderson that it was expected each proprietor would continue the making of the channel on his own side above the bridge. The pursuer was aware that I made the new channel on my side above the bridge. He sent Henderson to me to complain of it, and of the shingle being sent on his land after flood. . . . At that time I offered to cart away the shingle from pursuer's side, and I intimated that by writing to him. I also offered to cut the channel on the Drumquhirn side at my own expense when the gravel was removed. That was to prevent the possibility of injury to the pursuer from my operations, and also to diminish injury on my own side. The pursuer made no answer to that offer, and took no notice of it. The new channel silted up after a time, and I got it cleaned out frequently. I ultimately found that it was no use cleaning it out till a new outlet was made for it below the point B on the plan. If the new channel had been kept clear it would have been of great service to both parties. It was a much better channel than the old one. There is an embankment at B, which was made by me. There was high ground there before that embankment was made. The object of making that embankment was to prevent the outlet of the stream from being filled up by the silting of the sand at that point, and to prevent the flooding of the lower meadow land."

cient channel and outfall : Finds that shortly after the defender's entry, No. 155. meetings took place between him and one of his landlords, Messrs June 28, 1881. Dickson, and the pursuer, when it was agreed that a new channel for the Murdoch v. burn should be cut below the bridge, where the high road crosses, for the Wallace. purpose of securing a better outfall, and that this was done at the joint expense of the parties : Finds that it was part of this agreement that the pursuer should improve the channel of the burn from the bridge upwards to the point where it entered his land ; and the defender do the same from that point upwards to the point where it diverged into his meadow : Finds that the defender altered the course of the burn within his own lands, by cutting a new and straight channel for it, of sufficient breadth and depth, for about 300 yards, so that instead of winding tortuously in a narrow sheugh through his meadow, as it had formerly done, it flowed straight on his own side of the march-dyke, to that point where it entered the pursuer's land : Finds that at that point the defender erected an embankment to prevent the stream from overflowing into his own lower meadow, and diverge it at a slight angle into its old channel on the pursuer's side : Finds that the pursuer did nothing to improve the channel of the burn from that point to the bridge ; that he made no reply to an offer by the defender to do it for him ; and that to a letter on the subject from Mr George Dickson, dated 30th July 1862, he replied that he had had the damage done to his land by the defender valued, and had put the matter into the hands of his man of business : Finds that no proceedings were taken by or for the pursuer to vindicate his claim, and that no further communication on the subject was made by him to the defender till 11th September 1877 : Finds in law that the pursuer is barred by personal exceptions and mora from insisting in his present claim : Sustains the defender's 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th pleas, and assoilzies him from the conclusions of the action."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Macpherson), on 7th March 1881, " Finds that the Minnybuie burn, after flowing through the defender's farm, flowed through the lands of the pursuer, passing across the march between said farm and the pursuer's lands in a direction, for some distance on each side of the said march, nearly at right angles thereto, and flowed through the pursuer's lands till it reached a bridge some 200 or 300 yards lower down, after which it became the march between the two estates : Finds that in the early part of 1862 the defender altered the course of the burn, within the lands of which he is tenant, by cutting a new and straight channel for it for about 300 yards, so that, instead of winding through meadow land, it flowed close to a march-dyke between the estates, to the point where it previously entered the pursuer's lands, and as near thereto as the march-dyke permitted : Finds that at that point the defender erected an embankment to prevent the stream from overflowing the lower meadow of his own farm, and to divert it at a slight angle into its old channel on the pursuer's side : Finds that by reason of the defender's said operations the pursuer's land, near and adjacent to the point where the burn enters it, has suffered damage, mainly from having cast upon it gravel and sand brought down the new cut above described : Finds that the defender is liable to the pursuer for the said damage ; assesses the same at the sum of £25 : Therefore decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £25 : Quoad ultra refuses the prayer of the petition."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the defender ;—The operations carried on by the defender were proper and reasonable improvements on his own lands, and were within

No. 155.

June 28, 1881.
Murdoch v.
Wallace.

his legal rights.¹ They were not made in disregard of the lower heritor's rights, as he had offered to continue the cut at his own expense through the pursuer's lands, which would have obviated all the damage complained of. As a general rule proprietors were entitled to straighten the course of a meandering burn if they delivered it to the lower heritors at the same place as formerly, and did not decrease the volume of the water.² The pursuer was barred by his own delay from now insisting in the action, as he had allowed these operations to go unchallenged from 1862 to 1877, at the earliest. Evidence had been lost to the defender owing to this mora.

Argued for the pursuer;—The defender by his operations, especially by the embankment, had done damage to the pursuer's lands by deflecting the stream into his lands at an unnatural angle, instead of allowing it to flow into it in a straight line, as it did formerly. Though the embankment was erected on the defender's land it was ex adverso of the pursuer's, which had been held to be an illegal act. The pursuer was not entitled to put up an embankment which would have the effect of damaging the lands of a lower heritor.³ The defender had not suffered any damage in loss of evidence by the delay on the part of the pursuer.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case, which has been very ably stated on both sides, I cannot say that I have felt much difficulty. It is an action for alleged damage which was not challenged when it first began, but has been allowed to continue for twenty years, and now the claim is made against an outgoing tenant. I never saw an action raised in such circumstances before. Of the two parties to the cause the pursuer is the proprietor of certain lands, and the defender tenant of certain other lands on either side of one of these brawling streams so common in Highland districts. Of course this burn overflowed its banks during the winter floods, and did damage to the bordering lands. This burn is sometimes the boundary between the pursuer's and defender's lands, and sometimes flows exclusively in one of them. Through the ground occupied by the defender it flowed in a circuitous channel. Below that it entered the lands of the pursuer, and there, again, begins to meander in an eccentric line. The defender, finding that the land would be bettered if an open cast was made to carry the burn in a straight line through his farm, performed the necessary operation, and this, I assume, he did without entering into any agreement with the pursuer. Having done that he built an embankment on his own side of the stream which would have undoubtedly the effect of altering the current. He then proposed to the pursuer to make a similar alteration in the course of the burn as it ran through his ground, and actually proposed to make the alteration at his own expense. He evidently had no intention or design to injure his neighbour. The pursuer, however, refused to make any change, and wrote one or two letters to the defender threatening damages. After writing those letters he thought better of it, and, from 1862 to 1877, at soonest, he never made any complaint. He now raises an action concluding for all manner of things, interdict and damages amongst others. I am of opinion that the action is excluded by the circumstances, and I do not think that the case raises any general or abstract principle of law. No. 155.

¹ Campbell v. Bryson, Dec. 16, 1864, 3 Macph. 254, 37 Scot. Jur. 121.

² Ersk. Inst. ii. 9, 2.

³ Jackson v. Marshall, July 4, 1872, 10 Macph. 913, 44 Scot. 506; Bell's Prin. 971; Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane, July 4, 1828, 3 W. and S., 235.

So long as an agriculturist is merely performing operations on his own side of a stream for the benefit of his own farm it will require a very substantial amount of damage to be made out before the law will interfere with him. Now, in this case I am quite satisfied that there was not really any substantial damage done. On the contrary, I am rather inclined to think that what was done was beneficial and not injurious to the pursuer.

I might have felt some difficulty on the subject of the embankment if the case had been raised de recenti. The case of Jackson v. Marshall is very close to this one, though there the damage was greater. Though I concurred in the judgment pronounced in that case I thought it very narrow, and further reflection has induced me to doubt whether there we allowed sufficient modification of the general rule, and I should not be sorry to see the general rule we there laid down receive some modification. It is, however, not necessary to say anything about that just now, because I am of opinion that the defender was, in doing what he did, improving both his own and the pursuer's agriculture, and that if any damage was done it was so inconsiderable as not to be worth mentioning. The very length of time that elapsed before this action was raised proves that the damage was not substantial. On the whole case, I think the Sheriff's interlocutor should be altered, and the defender assolizied.

LORD YOUNG.—I entirely concur with your Lordship, and that without reference to the alleged mora, which is a mere topic in this or any other case, though it may be very important to their decision. I am prepared to agree with your Lordship in giving effect to two and a half lines of the defender's fifth plea in law, and they are more important than all the rest put together. They are these,—“that the said operations have been carried out by the defender in the legitimate exercise of his own and his landlord's rights, for the agricultural improvement of his farm, and not in æmulationem vicini.” I think that is so, and that is also the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute; and the importance of the mora is to aid us in coming to that conclusion. The tenant made this improvement nearly twenty years ago, and it is hard to say now that he was not at the time he made it acting in a legitimate course of farm cultivation. I do not think that cases of riparian proprietors on rivers need perplex us, as this is not a river; it is one of those little streams which flow down the hills, and it is not until several of them are collected together that they are called even a burn. The stream wanders about in a circuitous course in passing through the defender's land, and to say that he is not entitled to straighten its course so as to make it more available is extravagant. Such a thing is done in every part of the country, and agriculture would be very different to what it is if it were not. All that the defender did twenty years ago was done for a quite legitimate purpose within his own farm. The pursuer, however, says that by building the embankment the defender is sending down to him the water which would otherwise spread itself over his meadow, and that he is not entitled to do so. But I think there is nothing more legitimate. He is not interfering with the alveus by that embankment, he is simply protecting his own land from inundation, and thereby making his land more valuable. I think that the law is in accordance with the familiar practice of the country, viz., that an upper heritor is entitled to do anything to make a stream passing through his land as beneficial

June 28, 1881.

Murdoch v.
Wallace.

No. 155. and also as little hurtful as possible to his own property ; and if he sends down all the water he gets in as pure a condition as he got it to the lower heritor the latter has nothing to complain of. On the ground pleaded by the defender in his fifth plea I think he is entitled to be assoilzied.

June 28, 1881.
Murdoch v.
Wallace.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur, and have very little to add. I grant that as far as drainage operations are concerned a lower heritor is not entitled to complain of what the upper heritor does, but I am not prepared to say that if the course of a burn is for any reason changed, and if injury is thereby done to the lower heritor, there will not be a good claim for damages against what may in some views be a wrong. It does not follow from the general rule that an upper heritor may do anything he pleases irrespective of the interests of a lower. If substantial damage is done I should be disposed to give a measure of redress, such as is given by the Sheriff, but, looking at the circumstances, I am driven to conclude that the operations done were such as the defender could reasonably carry through. The silence of the pursuer in reference to the damage for so long a time satisfies me that he would have been more wise if he had never made any complaint, and now that he has made one that we cannot sustain it.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords, having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, find that the respondent (pursuer) has failed to establish that the operations complained of were to his injury, or beyond the legitimate rights of the appellant (defender): Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment of the Sheriff complained of, assoilzie the appellant from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

DAVID MILNE, S.S.C.—THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—Agents.

No. 156. DUKE OF ROXBURGHE, Petitioner.—D.-F. Kinnear—Mure.
A. J. RUSSELL, C.S. (Lady Charlotte I. Russell's Curator ad litem), Respondent.—J. P. B. Robertson—Low.

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

Entail—Disentail—Provisions to children under Aberdeen Act where subjects disentailed and new entail executed.—An heir of entail, who in his marriage-contract had burdened the estate to the extent of three years' free rents as at the date of his death, with provisions to his younger children, obtained from them discharges therefor in their respective marriage-contracts in consideration of provisions therein made, amounting together to £90,000, which he secured on the estate. Subsequently he disentailed his estate, and executed a new entail embracing additional lands, but subject to debts which reduced the free rental below that of the original estate. In the deed he declared that the whole estates should be subject to the real burden of the provisions in his own contract of marriage in favour of his younger children. By his settlement he appointed two of the younger children to the surplus above £90,000.

In a question between the next heir of entail and the younger children, held (1) that though the younger children had granted discharges of the provisions in their father's contract of marriage their father had effectually released them therefrom ; and (2) (in conformity with Irving v. Irving, 9 Macph. 539) that the provisions were to be measured by the free rental of the original estate as if it had not been disentailed at the date of their father's death.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
B.

THE DUKE OF ROXBURGHE, the petitioner, was heir of entail in possession of the Roxburghe estates under a deed of entail executed by his father, the late Duke, dated in 1870. He succeeded on his father's death on 23d April 1879, and was duly infeft in the said estates.

By his antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in 1836, the petitioner's No. 156.
 father, the late Duke, in exercise of the powers conferred upon him by the Aberdeen Act, bound himself, and the succeeding heirs of entail in the lands above mentioned, "to make payment out of the rents or proceeds of the said lands and estates of the provisions following to the child or children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, . . . viz., to one such child one year's free rent or value of the whole of the said entailed lands and estates, to two children, two years' free rent or value of the said whole lands and estates, and to three or more children three years' free rent or value of the foresaid whole lands and estates," as the amount of the free rent should be ascertained at the date of his death;
 "and declaring also that the said provisions shall be divisible among the said children, if more than one, and the representatives or assignees of those who shall predecease, claiming as aforesaid, in such proportions as the said noble Duke shall appoint by a writing under his hand at any time of his life, and, failing such appointment, the same shall be divided among such children and their representatives or assignees of children equally."

June 28, 1881.
 Duke of Rox-
 burghe v.
 Russell.

Besides the petitioner, the said heir of entail, there were three younger children born of the marriage, a son and two daughters.

In 1857 Lady Susan Harriet Innes Ker, the elder daughter, was married.
 By her antenuptial marriage-contract the Duke, her father, became bound to pay to the marriage-contract trustees £25,000 in name of tocher at the first term after his death. Of this the daughter, with consent of her future husband, then Mr James Grant Suttie, declared her acceptance "as in full satisfaction to them, and both of them, of the patrimony of the said Lady S. H.
 Innes Ker, and of all that they might ask, crave, or demand of or from the said James Henry Robert Duke of Roxburghe, or his representatives through his death, in name of legitim or on any other account whatever, his goodwill only excepted."

In 1862 Lady Charlotte Isabella Innes Ker was married to Mr George Russell. By her antenuptial marriage-contract the Duke, her father, bound himself, and his heirs, executors, successors, and representatives whomsoever, and likewise the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the said entailed estates, to provide, content, and pay to the trustees therein named, and to the survivors or survivor of them, out of the three years' rents of the said estates provided as aforesaid to his younger children, the sum of £25,000 in name of tocher to the said Lady Charlotte Isabella Russell, and that at and against the first term after his death, the spouses declaring their acceptance of this provision "as in full satisfaction to them and both of them of the patrimony of the said Lady Charlotte Isabella Innes Ker, and of all share of the provisions in favour of his younger children contained in the said Duke's contract of marriage, and of all that they might ask, claim, or demand of or from the said James Henry Robert Duke of Roxburghe, or his representatives, through his death, in name of legitim, executry, or on any other account whatever, his goodwill only excepted."

In 1866 the Duke's younger son, Lord Charles Innes Ker, was married.
 By his antenuptial contract the Duke, his father, made a provision of £40,000 in similar terms to that in the last mentioned marriage-contract, the spouses declaring their acceptance of the provision in similar terms.

In 1867 the Duke entered into an arrangement (which was subsequently embodied in a deed of agreement) with the three next heirs of entail to dis-entail his Roxburghe estates, and to resettle them, along with others which he possessed, in fee-simple upon the same series of heirs, under burden of the debts and provisions affecting the lands at the date of the disentail. In particular, he bound himself "to charge upon the fee of

No. 156.

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

the lands to be so entailed the provisions for the younger children of his marriage, for which he and his heirs of entail are liable" under his contract of marriage. The Duke was further authorised, before executing the new entail, to borrow a sum not exceeding £175,000 upon the security of the entailed lands, and to charge it upon the fee of the lands to be entailed. There was this reservation in the agreement,—“And if the fore-said power to borrow shall not have been exercised wholly prior to the execution of the said new deed of entail, a power to that effect shall be reserved to the said Duke in the said deed of entail, but which reserved power, in so far as not exercised at the date of the death of the said Duke, shall be available to his successors to the extent of affecting a charge of a sum not exceeding in whole £120,000 of the said sum of £175,000, including in said sum of £120,000 any sums which may in virtue of said reserved power have been made by the said Duke to affect the said lands, but exclusive always of the provisions under the said Duke's contract of marriage.” The power to borrow £120,000 of the £175,000 was agreed to as an equivalent for the fee-simple lands to be included in the new entail, the gross rental of which was £4625, 14s. 5d., and the power to borrow the remaining £55,000 was agreed to in respect of an obligation to assign certain policies of insurance, value £55,000, upon the life of the Duke.

In furtherance of these arrangements the Duke granted bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security over the estates contained in the original entails for securing the sums contained as above in the marriage-contracts of his younger children. Each of these deeds contained a declaration “that the principal sum therein contained is and shall be the share or proportion belonging to the said of the foresaid provision of three years' free rents of my said entailed lands and estates in favour of my younger children” contained in my contract of marriage.

These bonds were dated 17th and recorded in the Register of Sasines 20th December 1867.

The instrument of disentail was dated 11th June 1867, but was not recorded in the Register of Entails until 27th February 1868, and in the Register of Sasines until 18th March 1868. The new deed of entail, dated 18th June 1870, bore to be granted under the express burden of the granter's marriage-contract, and particularly of the provisions therein contained in favour of his younger children, “and for portions of which provisions I have granted bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security to the extent of the sum of £90,000 sterling over the earldom of Roxburghe and other lands and heritages in the first place hereinbefore disposed as under, which several bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security, and sums of money therein contained, are hereby declared to be real and express burdens on the said earldom and other lands hereinbefore conveyed.”

The Duke, who died as above stated upon 23d April 1879, left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 17th June 1874, in which, after narrating his own contract of marriage and those of his children, he proceeded,—“And whereas since the dates of the said several contracts of marriage I executed an instrument of disentail of the said entailed lands and estates of Roxburghe, . . . previous to the recording of which instrument of disentail I executed bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security in favour of the trustees under the contract of marriage of my said daughters and son for the said respective sums of £25,000, £25,000, and £40,000, being the shares of the said three years' rents of the said entailed lands and estates thereby and by the said contracts of marriage, apportioned to my said children . . . And whereas the said whole lands and estates contained in the said instrument of disentail, and also certain other lands previously held by me in fee-simple, have since been entailed by me under burden of the foresaid contract of marriage and bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security, therefore I do hereby declare that, in the event of the said three years' rents provided as aforesaid of the foresaid lands and estates exceeding the sum of £90,000 sterling (being the total amount of the said two sums of £25,000 and the sum of £40,000, which have been secured over the said lands and estates as aforesaid), and of a farther sum falling to the younger children of my said marriage in excess of the sums provided and secured as aforesaid, then and in that event the excess or surplus of the said provision of three years' rents beyond the said sum of £90,000 shall be and is hereby appointed to my said two daughters in the following proportions, that is to say, two-fifth equal parts or shares thereof to the said Lady Susan Harriet Innes Ker or Grant Suttie, and the remaining three-fifth parts or shares thereof to the said Lady Charlotte Isabella Innes Ker or Russell, and shall be paid to the trustees under their respective contracts of marriage in said proportions, to be held and disposed of by the said trustees upon and for the like trusts as and upon which the said two sums of £25,000 are directed to be held and disposed of. . . ."

No. 156.
June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

At the time of the Duke's death the whole estates included in the new entail were burdened with the sum of £175,000. Their free yearly rental, after allowing for public burdens, the interest on the foresaid sum of £175,000 and other deductions, amounted to £34,700, 1s. 2d. Three years' free rental thus amounted to £104,100, 3s. 6d. Taking from that the sum of £90,000, being the two sums of £25,000 and the £40,000 already charged upon the subjects as above stated, there remained a balance of £14,100, 3s. 6d. which fell to be paid in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement above narrated, to the trustees under the marriage-contracts of the two daughters.

The petitioner brought this petition under the Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (Rutherford Act), praying the Court "to find that the amount of provisions falling to the younger children of the said late Duke of Roxburghe who have not succeeded to the said entailed lands and estates, in terms of the said late Duke of Roxburghe's contract of marriage set forth in the petition, and statute 5 Geo. IV. cap. 87, is £104,100, 3s. 6d., or such other sum as your Lordships may ascertain to have been the amount of three years' free rent or value of the said entailed lands and estates, called the Roxburghe estates, as at the death of the said late Duke of Roxburghe; and that, after deducting therefrom the sum of £90,000, settled by the said late Duke of Roxburghe upon his three younger children before named under their respective contracts of marriage mentioned in the petition, and already charged as a burden on the said entailed lands and estates, there remains a balance of the said three years' free rent or value available for said provisions, amounting to £14,100, 3s. 6d., or such other sum as your Lordships may ascertain to be the balance of three years' free rent or value as aforesaid, which balance, in terms of the said late Duke of Roxburghe's trust-disposition and settlement is payable to" [naming the trustees under the said two contracts of marriage] "in the proportion of three-fifths thereof."

The petitioner further asked authority to execute bonds and dispositions in security over the lands for the said sum in terms thereof.

The petition was served upon the three nearest heirs of entail, who did not appear. A remit was thereafter made to Mr H. H. Inglis, W.S., to "examine whether the provisions of the statutes and Acts of Sederunt have been complied with, and also to inquire into the facts and circumstances set forth in the petition."

No. 156.

June 28, 1881.
 Duke of Rox-
 burghe v.
 Russell.

Mr Inglis in his report suggested a doubt whether the marriage-contract provisions in favour of the younger children had been rightly estimated at three years' rents of the whole lands embraced in the new entail under burden of the interest of the debt, and indicated his opinion, in accordance with the case of Irving v. Irving, 9 Macph. 539, that the rental of the lands embraced in the original entail should be taken subject to such deductions only as would have been allowed had they remained under the original entail, and reported that giving effect to this view the provisions to younger children would amount to the larger sum of £109,401, leaving a balance to be charged on the estates of £19,401.

Upon the report, dated January 25, 1881, being lodged, the Lord Ordinary (Lee), in respect of it, appointed Mr A. J. Russell, C.S., to be curator ad litem to Lady Charlotte I. Russell.

Mr Russell lodged a minute, stating that he considered it "his duty to adopt to a certain extent the views taken by the reporter," and therefore to oppose the petition.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) found, upon 19th March 1881, that the amount of the provisions falling to the younger children was £104,100, 3s. 6d., "being the amount of three years' free rent or value of the said entailed lands and estates called the Roxburghe estates as at the death of the said late Duke of Roxburghe, and that after deducting therefrom the sum of £90,000 settled by the said late Duke of Roxburghe upon his three younger children, Lady Susan Harriet Grant Suttie, Lady Charlotte Isabella Russell, and Lord Charles John Innes Ker, under their respective contracts of marriage mentioned in the petition, and already charged as a burden on the said entailed lands and estates, there remains a balance of the said three years' free rent or value available for said provisions amounting to £14,100, 3s. 6d., which balance, in terms of the said late Duke of Roxburghe's trust-disposition and settlement, is payable to" [the trustees under the marriage-settlements of his two daughters in the proportions of two-fifths and three-fifths respectively]; "and for that purpose grants warrant and authorises the petitioner to make and execute the following bonds and dispositions in security, ranking pari passu with each other over the whole of the said entailed lands and estates other than the mansion-houses, offices, and policies thereof, for the said sum of £14,100, 3s. 6d., being the balance of free rents as aforesaid, viz." [specifying the bonds for the sums proportioned as above], "such bonds and dispositions in security containing a power of sale, and all clauses usual in bonds and dispositions in security over estates in Scotland held in fee-simple, and decerns: Remits to Mr Inglis to adjust and revise the drafts of said deeds, and to see the same extended, executed, and put upon record, and to report." *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the rental which ought to be taken is not the rental of the estates at the time when the late Duke of Roxburghe executed his marriage-contract, but the rental of the estates as entailed at his death. By the marriage-contracts of the three younger children they accepted the sums of £25,000, £25,000, and £40,000 as in full of all that they could claim under the obligation in their father's marriage-contract in their favour; and if the Duke had not by his deed of settlement given to the two daughters a further right, no claim would have been competent beyond the sums given them at the time of their marriage. This right so conferred by the Duke was entirely voluntary and gratuitous on his part; the obligation in the marriage-contract had been satisfied and fulfilled, and a discharge obtained from the creditors in that obligation. What, then, was the Duke's meaning when he appointed that any money beyond the sums provided to his two daughters required to make up three years' free rental should still be provided to his

The curator ad litem reclaimed, and argued;—By the second deed of entail the obligations to the younger children in the original marriage-contract were revived in so far as not satisfied by the provisions of £90,000 secured by the bonds of corroboration, &c. The Duke had there-
 June 28, 1881.
 Duke of Rox-
 burghe v.
 Russell.
 by restored them to the position they had occupied prior to the discharges and subsequent disentail.

Argued for the petitioner;—The discharges granted by the children extinguished their rights under their father's marriage-contract, so that their rights now depended entirely upon the new entail.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question before us is how the younger children's provisions made by the late Duke of Roxburghe are to be charged upon the rents of the entailed estate; and there is a complication of deeds here, to the provisions of which it is necessary very specially to attend in order to answer this question satisfactorily.

The provisions were made by the Duke of Roxburghe in the year 1836 in a marriage-contract between himself and his then intended spouse, in which, in pursuance of powers conferred upon heirs of entail by the Aberdeen Act, he bound himself, and the heirs of entail succeeding to him in the lands and estate of Roxburghe, to make payment out of the rents or proceeds of the said lands and estate of the provisions following to the child or children to be procreated of the intended marriage; and then the amount of the provisions is more particularly specified. At this time the entail comprehended only what is known under the general name of the Roxburghe estate, but afterwards the Duke entered into an arrangement with the three next heirs of entail for disentailing that estate, and for adding certain fee-simple lands which he possessed to the estate of Roxburghe, and re-entailing the whole, under certain conditions and provisions specified in the agreement which he made with those heirs of entail. And, among other conditions of that agreement, there was one to the effect that he should be entitled to burden the whole entailed lands, including the old Roxburghe estate and the new fee-simple lands, with a debt of £175,000. This arrangement was carried out, and a new deed of entail was accordingly executed.

Now, if there had been no more in the case than what I have just stated, it is quite obvious that the question we have to determine would be regulated by the authority of the case of Irving. The younger children, in respect of their provisions, would have neither taken advantage from this new deed of entail, nor could they have been prejudiced by the proceedings for disentail and the re-entailing deed, but they would just have taken their provisions as three years' free rents of the entailed lands of Roxburghe, subject to the deductions which would have been made from those provisions had the original deed stood. But in the present case, in the interval between the making of the provision and the disentail and re-entailing, there occurred a very important transaction, or series of transactions, upon occasion of the marriage of the three younger children. The Duke of Roxburghe was a party to the marriage-contracts of all the three younger daughters in the proportion of two-fifths to the one and three-fifths to the other? What rental was in his mind at the time he executed this testamentary deed? He had executed a new entail, and declared the provisions in favour of his children to be burdens upon the estate contained in that new entail, and there can be no doubt whatever that the rental he was dealing with was that of the estate contained in the then existing entail."

No. 156.

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

children. He gave his younger son a sum of £40,000, and each of his daughters a sum of £25,000, as in full satisfaction of the provisions which had been made in their favour in his original marriage-contract, and he took from each of those younger children a discharge of their provisions. Here, again, if we stop and consider how the matter would stand, it is quite plain that the discharge contained in these marriage-contracts would have prevented the case of Irving from applying, and would have settled the whole matter in this way, that each daughter would receive £25,000 as in full of her provision, and the son would receive £40,000, and no question like the present could have arisen.

But what gives rise to the difficulty and peculiarity of this case is, in the first place, certain clauses which occur in the new deed of entail, and secondly, a clause which occurs in the Duke of Roxburghe's deed of settlement. The new deed of entail was executed in 1870. Prior to that the Duke had granted bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security over the original estate for each of the sums of £25,000 provided to each daughter, and for the sum of £40,000 provided to the younger son. It is necessary to mention that merely historically, because it really does not much affect the judgment. But after all that had been done, when the Duke came to execute his new deed of entail in 1870, he inserted a clause declaring his marriage-contract, and the provisions to younger children therein contained, to be real burdens upon the whole lands and estate thereby entailed—that is, the enlarged and new entailed estate. Now, this is plainly inconsistent with the notion of those provisions having been discharged as they were in the marriage-contracts, and inconsistent also with the bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security which he had granted for those sums, and as the deed goes on it becomes more clear that he does not intend to avail himself of the discharges contained in these marriage-contracts, but, on the contrary, intends that his younger children shall have the full benefit of the provisions settled in his own marriage-contract. The £90,000 which is the aggregate of the sums provided in the children's marriage-contracts, and for which they granted a discharge of their provisions, falls short, in his opinion, and has been found in fact to fall short, of what they would have been entitled to under the original arrangement in his marriage-contract. What he does, in the words I have just read, is to make the whole provisions, the full sum provided in his own marriage-contract, a real burden upon the whole lands and estates of new entailed by the new deed of entail. But while he makes these provisions a real burden upon that estate, it must be observed that he does not reconstitute these provisions. There is no constitution of a provision under the Aberdeen Act in this new entail. It is the keeping up of a provision already made and constituted. The Aberdeen Act provides a particular way in which an heir of entail in possession is entitled to constitute a provision upon an entailed estate. He is to grant a bond or obligation, by the 4th section, "binding the succeeding heirs of entail in payment out of the rents or proceeds of the same to the lawful child or lawful children of the person granting such bonds or obligations who shall not succeed to such entailed estate, of such sum or sums of money, bearing interest from the granter's death," as to him shall seem fit, and so on. So that the only mode in which a provision can be constituted against an entailed estate is by granting a bond or obligation binding the heir in possession and the succeeding heirs of entail to pay the amount of the provision out of the rents of the entailed estate.

Now, the provision, therefore, which is kept up by the clause which I have read and made a real burden upon the new and enlarged entailed estate, is a bond or obligation upon himself and the heirs succeeding to him under the old entail of Roxburghe to pay out of the rents of that entailed estate of Roxburghe three years' rents of that entailed estate of Roxburghe. There is no other subsisting provision in favour of the younger children but that. Then the deed proceeds to dispose the lands with and under the burdens, conditions, prohibitions, reservations, and so forth, and, first, with and under the real and express burden of a contract of marriage dated in 1836, entered into between him and his then intended spouse—(that is his own contract of marriage, in which the provision of which I have been speaking is contained)—“and particularly, without prejudice to the said generality, of the provision therein contained, whereby I, with consent of my said curators, and in exercise of the powers vested in me by the statute 5 Geo. IV., cap. 87, as heir of entail in possession of the then entailed lands and estate of Roxburghe, bound and obliged myself, and the whole heirs of entail and provision succeeding to me in the said entailed lands and estates, to make payment out of the rents or proceeds of the said lands and estates of the provisions following to the child or children to be procreated of the then intended marriage who should be alive at my death, and should not succeed to the said entailed lands and estates, and to the representatives or assignees of those children who should predecease me, claiming right in virtue of special settlement by marriage-contract;” and then follows a specification of the provisions. Then he adds these words at the end—“And for portions of which provisions I have granted bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security to the extent of the sum of £90,000 sterling over the earldom of Roxburghe, and other lands and heritages in the first place hereinbefore disposed as under, which several bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security, and sums of money therein contained, are hereby declared to be real and express burdens on the said earldom and other lands hereinbefore conveyed.” Now, it appears to me that one of the effects of these clauses of the new deed of entail is that the Duke of Roxburghe thereby entirely renounces all benefit from the discharges which he had taken in the marriage-contracts of the younger children. He reinstates them in the full right of the provisions which were made in his own marriage-contract, and while he declares the amount of those provisions which he very specially describes to be a real and preferable burden over the new entailed estate, he does not in the slightest degree alter the nature of the provision as originally constituted over the old entailed estate of Roxburghe. The making of these provisions a real burden upon the enlarged estate does not in the least degree alter the nature of the thing which is so made a burden. It does not extend the obligation which he created against the heirs of entail succeeding to himself in the old estate of Roxburghe. On the contrary, the thing as it stands under the marriage-contract, freed altogether of the restriction created by the discharges in the younger children's marriage-contracts, is to remain exactly as it stood from the beginning, but to be a real burden upon the new entailed estate. The discharges which were contained in the younger children's marriage-contracts were discharges in favour of the Duke of Roxburghe, their father. Nobody else is entitled to plead upon these discharges, or to take any benefit from them, and if he chooses to renounce the benefit of them he is quite at liberty to do so, and so far as I can see he has most clearly and distinctly shewn his purpose and intention so to do in this clause of the new entail.

Now, that brings us back exactly to the same position as if the discharges in

No. 156.

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

No. 156. the younger children's marriage-contracts had never been made ; and that brings us back to the position in which the case of Irving is directly applicable as an authority. It was the occurrence of these discharges that prevented the application of the doctrine of Irving's case ; but the moment the discharges are taken out of the way, the authority of the rule of that case returns, and the younger children are entitled to say—"We cannot be either disadvantaged or prejudiced by this arrangement as to disentailing the estate, and re-entailing it along with other lands. We are no parties to that arrangement. Our consent was not required, and was not asked. The whole thing is carried through between the Duke of Roxburghe and the three next heirs of entail, among whom we are not ; and therefore we are entitled to stand exactly in the same position as if the entail of Roxburghe had never been destroyed or put an end to, but still subsisted."

Then, finally, there is the trust-settlement of the Duke of Roxburghe, which also throws a good deal of light upon this subject. I think the matter stands very clearly indeed upon the clause of the new entail which I have just adverted to ; but the provision which I am about to call attention to in the Duke's trust-settlement is strongly corroborative of that view. The clause is a single clause ; there is no other clause in the deed apparently making any reference to these provisions at all, and it is not unimportant to observe that although this clause is a pretty long one, and has a good deal of recital in it, the operative part of it is extremely simple. It is simply the making of an apportionment ; that is the only operative part of it. The younger son had got £40,000 settled upon him by his marriage-contract ; and the Duke did not think fit to give him any greater share of the provisions contained in his own marriage-contract. He intended to divide the balance over the £90,000 between his two daughters ; and that is the operative effect of this clause. The whole of it is important, keeping in view that that is the sole purpose for which it is introduced into the deed of settlement. He says—"Whereas since the dates of the said several contracts of marriage I executed an instrument of disentail of the said entailed lands and estates of Roxburghe"—(that is the old estate)—"which was recorded in the Register of Entails under the authority of the Court of Session on the 24th day of February 1868, previous to the recording of which instrument of disentail I executed bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security in favour of the trustees under the contracts of marriage of my said daughters and son for the said respective sums of £25,000, £25,000, and £40,000 being the shares of the said three years' rents of the said entailed lands and estates thereby, and by the said contracts of marriage, apportioned to my said children, which bonds and dispositions in security are all dated the 17th, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines the 20th days of December 1867 ; and whereas the said whole lands and estates contained in the said instrument of disentail"—now that is the old estate of Roxburghe—"and also certain other lands previously held by me in fee-simple, have since been entailed by me under burden of the foresaid contract of marriage and bonds of corroboration and dispositions in security, therefore I do hereby declare that in the event of the said three years' rents provided as aforesaid of the foressaid lands and estates"—now, observe, the only provision of three years' rents of any lands and estates that ever was made by the Duke of Roxburghe was the provision contained in his own marriage-contract—"exceeding the sum of £90,000 sterling (being the total amount of the said two sums of

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

£25,000 and the sum of £40,000 which have been secured over the said lands and estates as aforesaid)"—that is, secured over the new entailed estate—"and of a further sum falling to the younger children of my said marriage in excess of the sums provided and secured as aforesaid, then and in that event the excess or surplus of the said provision of three years' rents beyond the said sum of £90,000 shall be and is hereby appointed to my said two daughters in the following proportions," and so on. The whole of these deeds, taken together, I think, make it perfectly clear, in the first place, that the only provision under the Aberdeen Act that was ever made by the Duke of Roxburghe was the provision contained in his own marriage-contract of 1836, and that that provision, as regards its essential character and effect, was never altered.

No. 156.
June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

Now, that provision consists of three years' rents of the old entailed estate of Roxburghe, and is in the form of an obligation under the 4th section of the Aberdeen Act, binding the Duke and the succeeding heirs of entail in the old estate of Roxburghe to pay that sum out of the rents of that estate. That provision, however, has been dealt with in various ways by the Duke, but never altered as to its character or its extent except in so far as it was to a certain extent discharged in the marriage-contracts of the younger children. He bought off the provision at one time in these marriage-contracts by payment of a sum of £90,000 in all—that is to say, by a prospective payment of £90,000 in all—but then he went back upon that, and he expresses very clearly his intention of not standing upon those discharges, but of giving effect to the full provision contained in his own marriage-contract, and in order to make that provision more certainly effectual to the younger children he made it a burden upon the whole lands included in the new deed of entail, very clearly expressing at the same time that it was not his intention to alter the nature of that provision, but, on the contrary, to maintain it exactly as it stood in his marriage-contract of 1836.

Now, in these circumstances, I am quite unable to agree with the view that has been taken by the Lord Ordinary. I think that the alternative which is presented by the reporter of a balance calculated upon the footing of taking the estate in the old deed of entail as it stood at the time when the provision was made, and taking three years' rents of that estate as they would have stood at the death of the grantor supposing no disentail had ever been made, is the true measure of the provisions now to be settled.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I have also come to the same conclusion. The sum, as I understand the case, which under the marriage-contract of the late Duke of Roxburghe was to be charged under the Aberdeen Act, amounted to three years' free rent of the entailed estates as they then stood, and as the same should be ascertained at the date of the death of the Duke of Roxburghe. That is quite distinct from the terms of the marriage-contract. Of the sum so to be charged, £25,000 was settled upon each of the Duke's daughters at their marriage as their share of those three years' free rents, and £40,000 was settled upon his younger son; and from each of those children a discharge was taken of their respective provisions under the marriage-contracts. So the matter stood till proceedings were taken in 1867 with a view to a new entail, which have been fully explained by your Lordship; and those appear to me substan-

No. 156.

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

tially to come to this, that certain fee-simple lands belonging to the Duke of Roxburghe were to be added to the entailed estate, and that a power was taken to burden the whole estates to the extent of the value of the fee-simple lands which were added to the entail. The gross sum with which power was taken to burden the whole estates under the new entail was £175,000. But of this under the same arrangement £55,000 was to be paid off by insurances, so that £120,000, being a sum about equal to the value of the fee-simple lands which were to be added to the entailed estate, was all that actually required to be charged against the estates under the new entail and relative arrangements. This, I think, is clear from the facts set out in the various parts of the reports which have been laid before us. In particular, we have a distinct statement of the nature of the agreement which was entered into amongst the family, the younger children of the present Duke being represented in that agreement; and it will be seen that an arrangement was made by which insurances were to be effected on the life of the Duke to the amount of £55,000 for the benefit of the estate; and the statement goes on to mention that—"By the said deed of agreement the late Duke of Roxburghe also bound himself 'to assign and convey the several policies mentioned in the schedule number two hereto annexed, and signed by the parties as relative hereto, and the sums that may become due under the same, to John Brown Innes and Charles Bowman Logan, both of the city of Edinburgh, Writers to the Signet, as trustees for the purposes after mentioned, with power to receive the sums that may fall due under the same, and which policies, and the sums to be received by the said trustees, shall be held and applied by them in payment of the said sum of £55,000, part of the said sum of £175,000, which the said Duke is to have power to charge on the said entailed estate as aforesaid,'" and that any surplus of the sums received under the policies which remained over after payment of the said £55,000 is to be settled in a certain way. That being the nature of the arrangement, which was carried out in the manner and under the reservations mentioned in the report, it is then stated—"This reserved power was afterwards fully exercised by him, and at the time of his death the whole estates included in the new entail stood burdened with the sum of £175,000. After his death, which happened on or about this date, the policies of assurance on his life above referred to became payable, and the proceeds thereof to the extent of £55,000 were, in terms of the before-mentioned arrangement, applied in extinction pro tanto of the said debts of £175,000 secured upon the entailed estates, thus reducing these debts to £120,000, at which amount they still remain." Now, that being the nature of the arrangement which was gone into, and the provisions being discharged, the younger children, as your Lordship has remarked, could have no claim against the Duke beyond the sum of £90,000 which was charged against the old estate. But by the trust-deed that discharge is set aside apparently—that is to say, the late Duke's intention is apparent not to act upon it with regard to his daughters. For it is distinctly provided by the trust-deed that any sum of the free rents beyond the £90,000 should be divided in certain proportions amongst his two daughters. The question therefore is raised at the Duke's death, whether those free rents are to be taken as the free rents of the estate which existed at the time of the marriage-contract, or the free rents of the new entailed estate, which included the fee-simple lands over which the entail was extended. Now, looking to the words and expressions used in the whole of these transactions, where the Duke speaks of the marriage-contract provisions, I think he has in view the provisions made upon the old entailed estates ; for it was with reference to those estates that the marriage-contract proceeded, and it was upon them also that the burden was to be laid with reference to which the discharge was obtained, and when those discharges were waived by the Duke it appears to me that his intention was to give his daughters the difference between the £90,000 and the three years' free rent of the old estates. That is the construction which I am disposed to put upon the language used in the deeds. But even if that were doubtful, I think that the case to which our attention has been called by the reporter—the case of Irving—lays down a rule which we must act upon here to the extent of not allowing any further charge to be made upon the new than was done upon the old entailed estate. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship, that as between the two views we should take the suggestion of the reporter, by which the rental of the old entailed estates will be taken as at the date of the Duke's death, for it was with reference to it that the marriage-contract was originally settled.

No. 156.

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

LORD SHAND.—I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordships in this case. The Lord Ordinary has held that the provisions of the younger children are to be taken as being three years' free rents of the whole estates contained in the new entail of 1870. It appears to me that there is an insuperable objection to that view being taken, which is this, that there has been no bond or other deed of provision executed by the Duke of Roxburghe affecting the lands which were for the first time entailed in 1870. A new entail having then been created by which lands of considerable rental were added to the old estates, in order to create a good provision upon these new lands, it was necessary that the Duke of Roxburghe should execute a deed of obligation applicable to those new lands—in short, should create a provision with reference to those new lands which would bind the heirs of entail succeeding to them. No such deed has been executed. There has never been a deed of provision granted to affect those lands or the heirs of entail succeeding to them, and therefore we cannot, I think, hold this to be a provision affecting the whole of the entailed estates. There are subsisting deeds of provisions affecting the old entailed estates, and these are the only effectual deeds.

Now, that being so, reading the disposition and deed of settlement by the Duke of Roxburghe in the light of the whole circumstances, and having regard to the various considerations pointed out by your Lordship, I have come to be clearly of opinion that the three years' free rents referred to in his Grace's deed of settlement are rents of the old estates, and of the old estates only.

But though that be so, the question remains, What burdens are to be deducted from those rents? The deeds of provision declare that the amount of the free rents shall be ascertained as at the date of the death of the Duke of Roxburghe, and when the late Duke died he had a considerable amount of debts, imposed no doubt under the new arrangement with the heirs of entail, but still he had added a considerable amount of debt to the lands contained in the old entail, and that debt subsisted at his death. I confess I have felt it a question attended with considerable difficulty, whether, with reference to the question of taking the amount of the free rents at the death of the Duke, it was not necessary to look at all the debts as they subsisted at his death, and make a deduction on account of these, including the debt that was added when the new entail was executed. If that course had to be followed I have no doubt

No. 156. this would have involved an apportionment of the debt—that is to say, that

June 28, 1881.
Duke of Rox-
burghe v.
Russell.

while you take the three years' free rents of the old estate as the provision given, subject to the debt affecting it, it would not do to take the debt affecting the whole estates and deduct the whole amount from those three years' free rents, but it would have been right to make an allocation of the debt, so much of it applicable to the old estates, and so much to the new, in proportion to their respective rentals. I have, however, come to the conclusion with your Lordships that that is not a sound view to be taken of this matter. The case of Irving seems to be an authority which we ought to follow in this case. As Lord Cowan puts it,—“The solution of this question will be found by allowing these deductions only which could competently have been made had the entail still subsisted :” and accepting the authority of the case of Irving, I have come to the conclusion that that is the course which ought to be adopted in this case. The result is, I think, that the amount of the provisions has been correctly brought out by the reporter, because I observe he has laid aside entirely the new debt created in 1870, and then laid upon the estate, and has deducted only the public burdens affecting the lands in question.

I think it right, however, to say, that even if the alternative view had been adopted in this case—the view of taking the rental of the whole estates and giving effect to the interest of the debt laid on in 1870—I do not think the difference would have been so large in the result as the reporter has brought out. I find that in bringing out the rental of the whole lands, with the deductions to be made from that rental, he says that from the certified rental it appears that the free yearly rents or values of these estates amounted to £34,700, after deducting public burdens, “the interest on the foresaid sum of £175,000” then standing secured over the estates, and an annuity to the Duchess. Now, it appears to me, looking to these deeds as a whole, that the interest which really affected these estates, in a question with the heirs of entail, was not £175,000, but only £120,000, because it was made a clear stipulation of the arrangement for the re-entail, and made a stipulation by the succeeding heirs themselves, that £120,000 only should be the debt permanently laid on that estate. There was to be £175,000 temporarily laid on the estate, but the Duke undertook, as matter of agreement, that out of his personal estate, and by means of policies of insurance upon his life, the sum of £175,000 should be cut down to £120,000 the moment he died. It appears to me, therefore, that in estimating the rents as at the date of his death, even if the other alternative had received effect, the interest to be deducted would not have been the interest upon £175,000 but upon £120,000, and the result, I think, would have been to raise the amount brought out by the reporter of £14,100 as the sum to which these ladies were entitled for their provisions, by the sum of between £2000 and £3000—I do not know precisely how much—so as to bring it up to something near £17,000 altogether. I make that observation only for the purpose of saying that, after all, the difference between the two views is not so great as it appears on this report.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—“Having considered the reclaiming note for Mr A. J. Russell, C.S., curator ad litem to the Right Hon. Lady Charlotte Isabella Innes Ker or Russell, wife of George Russell, Esq., and now insisted in by his Grace the Duke of Roxburghe and others, the trustees under the antenuptial contract of marriage between the said George Russell and the said Right Hon. Lady Charlotte Isabella Innes Ker or Russell, who were sisted as parties to the process by interlocutor of 19th May last, and heard counsel, Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 19th March last: Find that the provision which is sought to be charged on the entailed estate is constituted in terms of sec. 4 of the Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 87, by the marriage-contract of the late Duke of Roxburghe in 1836, whereby he bound himself and the heirs succeeding to him in the lands and estate of Roxburghe, under the then existing entail of the said estate, to pay to the younger children out of the rents of said entailed estate certain sums, not exceeding three years' free rents of the said estate as the amount of the same shall be ascertained at the death of the said Duke: Find that the provision so constituted still subsists, and is the provision proposed to be made a charge under the petition: Find that the amount of the said provision consists of three years' free rents of the said lands and estate of Roxburghe comprehended in the entail subsisting at the date of the marriage-contract of 1836, as the same would have stood and would have been ascertained at the death of the said Duke, grantor of the said provisions, if the estate of Roxburghe had not been disentailed and re-entailed along with other lands: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as shall be just and consistent with the above findings," &c.

No. 156.
June 23, 1881.
Duke of Roxburghe v. Russell.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—RUSSELL & NICOLSON, C.S.—Agents.

JANET WINGATE MITCHELL, Appellant.—Trayner—Pearson. No. 157.
EBENEZER ERSKINE SCOTT (Moir's Trustee), Respondent.—Mackay—Low. June 29, 1881.
Mitchell v. Scott.

Diligence—Bankruptcy—Arrestment on dependence of an action.—Arrestments used on the dependence of an action confer a preference although the defender be sequestrated before decree is obtained in the action, provided they be followed up without undue delay.

Diligence—Arrestment—Judicial Factor—Factor loco absentis.—It is competent to arrest in the hands of a factor loco absentis funds belonging to his ward's estate.

ON 3d November 1879 Miss Janet Wingate Mitchell, Alloa, raised an action for payment in the Court of Session against James Moir, who was abroad, and against George Dalziel, W.S., who had been appointed factor loco absentis on Mr Moir's estate. Bill-Chamber. 1st Division Lord Fraser. M.

ON 5th November 1879 Miss Mitchell caused arrestments on the dependence of this action to be used in the hands of Mr George Dalziel.

ON 23d April 1880 the estates of James Moir were sequestrated, and thereafter Mr E. E. Scott, C.A., was appointed trustee, and received from Mr Dalziel the whole funds which he held as factor loco absentis.

ON 18th December 1880 Miss Mitchell obtained decree against Mr Moir, and the trustee in his sequestration, who had been sisted as a party to the action, for payment of £2274, 2s. 2d., with interest and expenses.

Miss Mitchell lodged a claim in the hands of Mr Scott, as trustee, for the amount decerned for, and maintained that she was entitled to be ranked preferably in virtue of her arrestment of the funds of Moir in the hands of his factor loco absentis.

The trustee rejected the claim to a preference on the following grounds:—"1. That no funds or moveable estate have been uplifted or received by him from said arrestees, other than from the said George Dalziel as

No. 157. factor loco absentis foresaid. 2. That the arrestment in the hands of the said George Dalziel, as factor foresaid, was incompetent and invalid, in respect that he was a defender in the action, and not a third party. 3. That the arrestments, even if competent and valid, being used upon the dependence of an action in which decree was not obtained until long after the date of the sequestration, were cut down and rendered ineffectual to create any preference in favour of the claimant by the sequestration of the effects of the said James Moir."

June 29, 1881.
Mitchell v.
Scott.

Miss Mitchell appealed to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, who pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal, recalls the deliverance of the trustee, and remits to him to rank the appellant preferably on the funds arrested on 5th November 1879 in the hands of George Dalziel, formerly factor loco absentis on the bankrupt's estate: Finds the trustee liable in expenses to the appellant: Allows an account of said expenses to be given in, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—In this case the question to be determined comes out very clearly upon the note of appeal and the deliverance of the trustee, and further written pleading is unnecessary.

"The appellant is a creditor of the bankrupt, James Moir, who left Scotland for Jamaica, or other foreign parts, and upon whose estate a factor loco absentis was appointed by the Court in the person of Mr George Dalziel. While Mr Dalziel was in the administration of the absent man's property the appellant raised, on 3d November 1879, an action against Moir and Dalziel to recover payment of the debt due to her. Upon the 5th November 1879 the appellant used arrestments on the dependence in Dalziel's hands as against Moir. On the 25th of April 1880 the estates of Moir were sequestered, and the factory in favour of Dalziel thereby in consequence came to an end. The pending action was in usual course intimated to the trustee, who sisted himself as a party to it; and decree therein was obtained by the appellant on 18th December 1880 against both Moir and the trustee in the sequestration.

"The appellant claims, in virtue of her arrestment, to be ranked preferably on the estate of Moir, and this claim has been rejected as a preferable claim but admitted to an ordinary ranking, the deliverance of the trustee being placed upon two grounds—1st, that the arrestment was inept in consequence of it being laid on in the hands of a person who was a party to the action; and 2dly, because an arrestment upon the dependence not followed up by decree till long after the date of the sequestration could not compete with the statutory rights of the trustee. And to these two grounds another was added at the debate before the Lord Ordinary, viz., that an arrestment in the hands of a factor loco absentis was incompetent.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that all these grounds are untenable in law. In regard to the first, the debtor was James Moir, and it was against him and his estate that decree was sought. Whether it was necessary to have made Dalziel a defender in the action may be doubted; but the fact that he was formally made so will not alter the rights of the creditor of Moir to attach moneys in the factor's hands belonging to Moir. The latter having left the country, and his estates being thus unprotected, the Court appointed an officer of their own for its protection, and for the administration of any moneys which the factor might collect. Such moneys Moir could at any time call upon the factor to account for; and such being the case, there can be no doubt that the fund was arrestable at the instance of his creditors. If the factor be a trustee, then the very point was decided in Kyle's Trustees v. White (14th November 1827, 6 S. 40), the rubric of which is, 'Competent to arrest in the hands of a trustee on the dependence of an action against the truster personally and the trustee himself qua trustee.' The office of factor loco absentis is one of trust, although the appointment be made by the Court. This disposes of the new points started at the debate to the effect that an arrestment in such an officer's hands was incompetent, because, it was argued, he and the absens were identical, and that it

The trustee reclaimed, and argued;—(1) An arrestment in the hands of a factor loco absentis was not competent. The factor was in law the same person as the principal, and it was not competent to arrest in the hands of a debtor for his own debt. (2) In order to obtain a preference an arrestment on the dependence of an action required to be followed up by decree in the action before the date of sequestration of the defender.¹

No. 157.

June 29, 1881.

Mitchell v.

Scott.

was just as idle to lay an arrestment in the factor's hands as it would be in those of Moir himself. This is a misapprehension as to the character of the office. The factor is not identical with the absens, although he is accountable for the money he collects to that person. He is an officer of Court, bound to manage the estate according to the rules laid down by the Pupils Protection Act, and he is amenable to the Accountant of Court as well as to the absens.

"The other ground upon which it is contended that no preference was acquired by the arrestment derives some countenance from the doctrine laid down by Erskine (3, 6, 18), where he says, 'If an arrester upon the dependence shall not have got his debt constituted by decree when preference is to be determined between him and the other arresters whose debts are constituted, those other arresters must be preferred to him from the nature of the debt itself; for one who has not yet made it appear that any sum is truly due to him can claim no preference.' Assuming this to be sound law, let us see how it can be applied to the present case. The 108th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1856, no doubt says that 'the sequestration shall as at the date thereof be equivalent to an arrestment in execution and decree of furthcoming;' and the fact is relied upon that the sequestration in this case took place in the month of April 1880, whereas decree was not obtained in the action at the appellant's instance until December of that year. There was thus, it is contended, the very case stated by Erskine, of an arrestment in execution followed by a decree of furthcoming eight months before the appellant had obtained a decree upon which execution could follow. This point arose under the former bankrupt statute in a case of M'Geachy v. Mellis (not reported, but stated in 2 Bell, Com., p. 79, note), where the Court found 'that the act of the Court awarding sequestration on the first deliverance on the petition for sequestration cannot be held as an arrestment in the question with arresters whose diligences were used sixty days or more before the sequestration.' It must, however, be kept in mind that the former Bankrupt Act, 33 Geo. III. cap. 74, under which the case of M'Geachy arose, did not contain a clause such as section 108 in the Act of 1856, declaring the effect of sequestration to be as above quoted. Still section 108 must be read along with section 102 of the Act of 1856, which enacts that the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee shall transfer to and vest in him as at the date of the sequestration the property of the debtor to the effect following—'1st, the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt, wherever situated, so far as attachable for debt, to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained, or intimation made at that date, subject always to such preferable securities as existed at the date of the sequestration, and are not null or reducible.' Now, the arrestment used by the appellant was undoubtedly a security which she had at the date of the sequestration, and it was not null and reducible; and section 108 must therefore be read as meaning that the sequestration shall operate as arrestment in execution followed by decree of furthcoming in regard only to property so far as free from preferable securities. If there had been undue delay in following up the action by obtaining decree, which there was not, it might be argued from section 12 that an objection could be stated against the arrestment; but not being open to any such challenge, it must stand as a good security which the trustee was bound to respect and to give effect to.

"It is not intended by this interlocutor to decide any question as to the amount of the appellant's claim. No argument was submitted to the Lord Ordinary on this matter. The only point here determined is, that the appellant is entitled to be ranked preferably and not merely as an ordinary creditor."

¹ Authorities.—Brodie v. M'Lellan, June 14, 1710, M. 816; Nairn v. Brown, Jan. 1724, M. 820; Watkins v. Wilkie, Jan. 2, 1728, M. 820; Campbell v. Hog,

No. 157. The Court did not require an answer on the competency of arresting in the hands of a factor loco absentis.

June 29, 1881.
Mitchell v.
Scott.

Argued for the arrester;—The passage in Erskine relied on did not apply to a case of bankruptcy.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the appellant is a creditor of a James Moir, who left Scotland some time ago, and on whose estate a factor loco absentis was appointed by the Court. While the estate of the absentee was being administered by the factor, the appellant raised an action against Moir, and also against the factor loco absentis, and on 5th November 1879 she used arrestments on the dependence of this action in the hands of the factor loco absentis. After this Moir's estate was sequestrated, and of course that put an end to the factory granted by the Court. The action was intimated to the trustee, who sisted himself as a party to it. Thereafter decree was obtained, but not until after the sequestration.

The appellant claims to be ranked preferably in the sequestration in respect of her arrestment in the hands of the factor loco absentis, and to this claim the trustee has made two objections. He says, in the first place, "that the arrestment in the hand of the said George Dalziel, as factor aforesaid, was incompetent and invalid, in respect that he was a defender in the action, and not a third party." And the trustee pleads, secondly, "that the arrestments, even if competent and valid, being used upon the dependence of an action in which decree was not obtained until long after the date of the sequestration, were cut down and rendered ineffectual to create any preference in favour of the claimant by the sequestration of the effects of the said James Moir." The Lord Ordinary has refused to give effect to either of these objections, and I agree with him.

As regards the first objection, it is hardly necessary to say anything. It is too plain for argument. There cannot be the least doubt that the factor loco absentis was under an obligation to account to the absentee, and that was sufficient to make him liable as arrestee. The other objection is more important, but I cannot say that I entertain any doubt as to the fact of a party who has arrested on the dependence of an action, but who has not obtained decree, being entitled to a ranking on a bankrupt estate as a preferable creditor as regards the estate which his arrestment covers, and the only difficulty arises from a passage in Erskine's Institutes, to which the Lord Ordinary has referred. Mr Erskine says—"If an arrester upon a dependence shall not have got his debt constituted by decree when the preference is to be determined between him and the other arresters whose debts are constituted, those other arresters must be preferred to him from the nature of the debt itself; for one who has not made it appear that any sum is truly due to him can claim no preference; and in the same manner, if the term of payment of a debt on which arrestment has been used be not yet come at the time of the competition in the forthcoming, the creditor

Feb. 15, 1729, M. 820; Carmichael v. Mosman, June 22, 1742, M. 2791; Wilson v. Fleming, June 26, 1823, 2 S. 383, 430; Ersk. Inst. iii. 6, 18; Bell's Comm. 5th edn. ii. 68, 72.

¹ Authorities.—Symington v. Symington, Dec. 3, 1875, ante, vol. iii. 205; Todd v. Smith, July 16, 1851, 13 D. 1371; Wyper v. Carr & Company, Feb. 2, 1877, ante, vol. iv. 444; Globe Insurance Company v. Scott's Trustees, Feb. 16, 1849, 11 D. 618, and August 5, 1850, 7 Bell's App. 296.

in that case can claim no preference; nay, he could not obtain a forthcoming No. 157. though there were no competition, because no creditor is entitled to payment till the term of his payment be come." Now, if this doctrine is intended to apply to a case in which there is no insolvency, and to that case only, I do not know that any exception can be taken to it; but I am afraid that a competition of arrestments where there is no insolvency is hardly a possible case. It is insolvency which gives arrestments their value. Therefore, if Erskine's doctrine is limited to cases in which there is no insolvency, it is one of very little importance. On the other hand, if it is intended to apply to the ranking of creditors on a bankrupt estate, I must say that I think it inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our system of bankruptcy. I am, therefore, prepared to adopt what Mr Bell says—that "if Mr Erskine's opinion be supposed applicable only to the case where there is no insolvency it is unobjectionable, if to the case of insolvency it seems to be unsound" (1 Bell's Comm. 316). And the unsoundness of the doctrine as applicable to the case of insolvency becomes very apparent when we consider those words in the passage from Erskine which I have read, but which are not quoted by the Lord Ordinary, for it is plain that in Erskine's opinion future and contingent creditors would not be entitled to rank in a sequestration; but as we all know, future and contingent creditors are just as much entitled to a ranking as present creditors, in a different way no doubt, and subject to different rules, but they are all entitled to claim in a sequestration. This does not depend on statute, but on the common law—on the fundamental rules of equity which underlie our whole system. If future creditors, i.e., those whose dates of payment have not yet come, and contingent creditors, i.e., those whose debts are not yet payable and may never become payable, were not entitled to claim in the sequestration, their debts would be gone for ever, because the bankrupt's discharge would finally put an end to them. The statute therefore allows future and contingent creditors to claim just as much and no more than justice requires. Future debtors are allowed to rank subject only to a deduction of interest for the period between the date of sequestration and of the payment of their debt. In the case of contingent creditors, a sum is set apart to meet their claim, should the condition upon which it depends become purified. If, therefore, the doctrine of Erskine applies to cases of insolvency, it would exclude this whole class of cases. Indeed, I cannot think that that learned writer refers to competitions in bankruptcy. The whole scope of the Bankruptcy Statutes is opposed to such a view. In particular, I may notice that equalising of diligence which is provided for by the 12th section. Before the process of sequestration was made applicable in the case of all debtors this equalising process was one of great importance. It is dealt with in the whole series of statutes in very much the same way, and the general effect is that all diligences used within sixty days of notour bankruptcy are equalised. We hear little of this now, because almost all estates are wound up by sequestration. But where there is no sequestration, how does the statute deal with this very subject of arrestment on the dependence? The 12th section provides that "arrestments and poidings which shall have been used within sixty days prior to the constitution of notour bankruptcy, or within four months thereafter, shall be ranked pari passu as if they had all been used of the same date, provided that if such arrestments are used on the dependence of an action, or on an illiquid debt, they be followed up without undue delay." Now, therefore, it is clear that the statute here contemplates that arrestment on the dependence is just as

June 29, 1881.
Mitchell v. Scott.

No. 157.
June 29, 1881.
Mitchell v.
Scott.

good a diligence as arrestment in execution, provided that there is no undue delay in following out the diligence. This provision seems to me directly in point in the present case. I am, therefore, of opinion that if the arrestment is used sixty days before sequestration, and is followed up without undue delay, and is in other respects unimpeachable, it will entitle the creditor to a preferable ranking, although sequestration of the debtor's estate has been awarded before following out the arrestment. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MACANDREW & WRIGHT, W.S.—ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 158.
June 30, 1881.
Main v. Flem-
ing's Trustees.

JOHN THOMAS MAIN (Fleming's Trustee), Pursuer.—D.-F. Kinnear—Asher—Lorimer.
ANDREW GALBRAITH AND OTHERS (Fleming's Trustees), Defender.—Trayner—C. S. Dickson.

Bankruptcy—Insolvent expending funds in improving estate held in trust for children—Resulting trust.—In an action by the trustee on A's sequestrated estate against his trustees under an antenuptial marriage-contract the pursuer alleged that A, after he was insolvent, and knew that he was insolvent, expended large sums of money on an estate which he had conveyed to the trustees in security of the annuity provided under the contract for his widow and as a provision to his children, and concluded, inter alia, for declarator, that so far as the estate was benefited by A's expenditure, after the date when he was alleged to have become insolvent, the marriage-contract trustees held for behoof of the trustee in bankruptcy. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark, diss. Lord Deas) that the pursuer's averments were relevant.

Process—Remit to Lord Ordinary to allow a Proof—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 62.—Section 62 of the Court of Session Act enacts that "when proof shall be ordered by one of the Divisions of the Court it shall no longer be competent to remit to one of the Lords Ordinary to take such proof, but it shall be taken before one of the Judges of the said Division." Held (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division) that this did not apply to a case where the Court recalled an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary dismissing an action as irrelevant, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

THIS was an action by John T. Main, trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Nicol Fleming, merchant, Glasgow, against Andrew Galbraith and others, trustees under the antenuptial marriage-contract of Mr Fleming.

The conclusions of the summons were "that the defenders, as trustees foresaid, are vested in and hold All and Whole the lands of Keill, in the county of Argyll, in trust, for behoof of the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, to the extent of £10,000 sterling, or such other sum as may be ascertained in the course of the process to follow hereon to be the extent to which the said lands were improved, and the value thereof increased, by expenditure made thereon, by or on behalf of the said James Nicol Fleming, from and since 31st January 1871;" (2) for declarator "that the said sum of £10,000 sterling, or such other sum as may be ascertained as aforesaid, forms a real lien and burden in favour of the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, and his successors in office and assignees, upon All and Whole the twenty-shilling land of Kilcolmkell; . . . (3) or otherwise, in the event of the pursuer not obtaining decree in terms of the second conclusion hereof, the defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foreshaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of No. 158.

 £10,000 sterling, or such other sum as may be ascertained as aforesaid, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of citation.”

June 30, 1881.
 Main v. Flem-
 ing's Trustees.

The pursuer averred that by his antenuptial marriage-contract Mr Fleming had bound himself, in the event of his predecease, to pay his widow an annuity of £1000 per annum, and to assign to the trustees in security thereof certain shares and other property. The marriage-contract further provided that the balance of the trust-funds, after setting aside sufficient for securing the annuity, was to be held as a provision to the children of the marriage. Mr Fleming subsequently assigned the shares and other property to the trustees. The pursuer further averred that Mr Fleming subsequently bought the estate of Keill for £8698, and took the title in favour of the trustees, who granted him a lease at the rent of £250, but the whole price was repaid to him from the trust-funds.

The pursuer further averred ;—(Cond. 11) “Immediately on obtaining possession of Keill in 1865 Mr Fleming began to lay out large sums in permanently improving the estate. In 1873 he began to build a large mansion-house and to lay out grounds around it. This expenditure continued down to the stoppage of the City of Glasgow Bank in 1878. In 1865, when Mr Fleming began this expenditure, he is believed to have been solvent and possessed of considerable wealth, but extensive speculations led to his insolvency ; and in 1871 he was insolvent, as is shewn by a balance of his books made by himself as at 31st January 1871. From that date his insolvent condition became worse, but was not publicly known till the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank on 2d October 1878. Mr Fleming's debit balance with that bank steadily increased from 1870, when it was £433,475, to the stoppage of the bank, when his unsecured debit balance was £1,259,546, 16s. 10d. The securities held by the bank had never, during any part of the said period, approached the amount of the debt. Mr Fleming was sequestered on 13th November 1878. . . . The defenders were well aware and approved of the expenditure made by Mr Fleming.” (Cond. 12) “The amount expended by Mr Fleming in permanent improvements on Keill between 1865 and 1871 was about £2288, 10s. 4d. The amount repaid to him by the defenders from the sources mentioned in article 10th, in the same period was £6040, less the sum of £1259, 12s. 3d., mentioned in article 9th, leaving £3917, 19s. 9d. of the price of Keill then unrepaid. At that time (1871) the new mansion-house had not been commenced, but Mr Fleming was in the course of making extensive alterations and improvements on the estate and grounds. The mansion-house, which is large, was commenced in the end of 1872 or beginning of 1873. The value of Keill in January 1871 was about £11,000, and the said value (even assuming that there was liability to repay the said £3917, 19s. 9d.) taken along with the value of the other stocks held by the defenders, was much more than the security stipulated in the marriage-contract, and was amply sufficient to secure the obligations come under by Mr Fleming therein.” (Cond. 13) “Between January 1871 and December 1876, as above mentioned, the sum of £3917, 19s. 9d. was paid to Mr Fleming from the income of the trust-funds in repayment of the price of Keill. On the other hand, Mr Fleming expended large sums in carrying out improvements at Keill, and after crediting the income of the trust-estate between 1874 and 1878 (including the rent of Keill), amounting to about £2000, the amount expended by him between 1871 and 1878, during all which time he was and knew himself to be insolvent, was upwards of £28,000, exclusive of interest. The estate of Keill, in the hands of the

No. 158.

June 30, 1881.
Main v. Flem-
ing's Trustees.

defenders, has been increased in value to the extent of £10,000 by reason of the expenditure so made upon it between the years 1871 and 1878. Thereby the security afforded to the defenders, as trustees for Mr Fleming's obligations under the marriage-contract, has been greatly enhanced, and a large addition gratuitously made to the trust property. The said payments, amounting to £28,000 and upwards, were made by Mr Fleming to conjunct and confident persons—viz., to the defenders as trustees for his wife and children—without just, true, and necessary cause, and after the contraction of lawful debts from true creditors. . . . The said payments were in violation of the Statute 1621, cap. 18, and were also made fraudulently to disappoint the just rights of prior creditors, and they have been prejudiced thereby to the full extent of the said £10,000."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The trust-estate held by the defenders prior to 1871 having been more than sufficient to secure Mr Fleming's obligations under the marriage-contract libelled, the subsequent expenditure by him on the estate of Keill, while to his own knowledge insolvent, is an alienation struck at by the statute 1621, cap. 18, and a fraud against Mr Fleming's creditors at common law. (2) The pursuer, as trustee on Mr Fleming's estate, and representing creditors prior to 1871, is entitled to declarator as libelled, and to decree under one or other of the remaining alternative conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defenders, in their answers to the pursuer's averments, stated, inter alia,—"The value of Keill has not been enhanced by the expenditure in question to the amount alleged, or to any appreciable extent. The new mansion-house is out of proportion to the size of the estate, and diminishes its marketable value. The estate now in the hands of the defenders is inadequate to meet the purposes of the trust."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) Separatim, No action lies, upon the grounds alleged, while the defenders are vested in the estate for the purposes of the trust. (3) The expenditure libelled not having been an alienation, without true, just, or necessary cause in the sense of the Act 1621, cap. 18, the defenders should be assolizied. (4) The expenditure libelled having been for behoof of the bankrupt himself, as tenant foresaid, the action cannot be maintained. (5) The value of the estate of the defenders not having been increased by the said expenditure, the action cannot be maintained. (6) The material averments of the pursuer being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assolizied.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses: Allows an account thereof to be lodged, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The estate of Keill is held by the defenders in trust—first, in security of the provisions in favour of Mrs Fleming and her children, contained in the antenuptial contract of marriage between her and her husband, James Nicol Fleming, the bankrupt; and secondly, for behoof of James Nicol Fleming and his heirs and disponees.

"Keill was bought by Fleming in 1865. He laid out large sums in improving it. He was insolvent, it is said, in 1871, and the pursuers aver that his expenditure on Keill after that date increased its value to the amount of £10,000. That expenditure, it is further averred, was contrary to the Act 1621, as having been made in favour of conjunct and confident persons to the defenders, as trustees for the wife and children of the bankrupt. But it is not said that the

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer's averments were No. 158. relevant, and the Lord Ordinary should have allowed a proof. It was averred that Fleming had expended money in improving the estate after he knew that he was insolvent. That was the same as if he had paid away money to the marriage-contract trustees. The money did not belong to him, but to his creditors. The trustee was entitled to receive from the trustees the amount expended, so far as it had benefited the estate of the marriage-contract trustees.¹

Argued for the defenders;—There was no relevant averment to go to proof. The only mode in which the pursuer could ascertain how much the estate was improved by the expenditure was by the sale of the estate. The pursuer could not compel the trustees to sell.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The impression of the Lord Ordinary appears to have been that the sole object of the pursuer in this action is to establish a preferable claim over the estate of Keill, in the hands of the defenders, to the extent of £10,000. But the case was not so presented to us under this reclaiming note, and I do not think that that is the only claim made in the summons. It is quite true that if we gave decree in terms of the second declaratory conclusion there would be a preferable right established in the pursuer—preferable to the rights of the parties for whom the defenders' trust was originally constituted; but that is not trustees, or the wife and children, were in any way parties to the fraud, or knew of Fleming's insolvency.

"The purpose of this action is to have it declared that the defenders hold Keill in trust for the pursuer to the extent of £10,000, being the extent to which it was improved by Fleming's expenditure, and to have that sum declared a real burden in favour of the pursuer. There is a petitory conclusion against the defenders for payment of £10,000, but it was not insisted on.

"The pursuer does not disguise that his object is to establish a preferable claim over Keill to the extent of £10,000. This, indeed, as it seems to the Lord Ordinary, is the true meaning of the summons; for, if the £10,000 were declared to be a burden on Keill, the necessary consequence would be to give it a preference over the purposes of the trust.

"At the same time, the pursuer does not dispute that the trust was validly constituted, so as to secure the provisions in favour of the wife and children. His case is, that the augmented value should form a prior charge.

"To the Lord Ordinary it seems that the case of the pursuer is not well founded. The trust forms the first charge on the estate of Keill, and the bankrupt had a right of reversion only. The trust may not be entitled to the benefit of the increased value, but that is no reason for creating a prior charge in favour of the pursuer. The illegal expenditure which the bankrupt is said to have made cannot destroy the preference which is created by the trust, though it is possible that the defenders cannot take benefit by that expenditure. The right of the pursuer seems to be to prevent his reversion from being unduly encroached on—not to establish a preference.

"It is said by the pursuer that the interests of the children may fluctuate, according to the value of the estate of Keill. This is denied by the defenders. But, whatever be the merits of that question, it seems to the Lord Ordinary that it is not raised for decision in this action. The pursuer may take the necessary proceedings to fix the limit of the marriage-contract provisions. The Lord Ordinary decides nothing more than that he is not entitled to the preference which he claims."

¹ Selby v. Jollie, June 5, 1795, M. 13,438; Buchanan v. Stewart, Nov. 10, 1874, ante, vol. ii., p. 78; Watson v. Grant, May 14, 1874, ante, vol. i., p. 882; 2 Bell's Com. 189 (M'Laren's ed. 177).

No. 158. so under the first conclusion of the summons, which only asks for a declarator that the defenders, as trustees, are vested in the estate of Keill, "in trust for behoof of the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, to the extent of £10,000, or such other sum as may be ascertained in the course of the process to follow hereon to be the extent to which the said lands were improved, and the value thereof increased, by expenditure made thereon by or on behalf of James Nicol Fleming from and since 31st January 1871," being the date at which his insolvency commenced. Now, in determining whether there are relevant averments to support that conclusion, and whether the conclusion in itself is a competent demand upon the part of the pursuer, it is necessary to attend very particularly to the constitution of the trust which is in the hands of the defenders, and the obligations and purposes of that trust. It is contained in an antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr Fleming and his spouse, Mrs Elizabeth Galbraith; and, in security of a personal obligation undertaken by the husband in that contract to pay an annuity of £1000 to his wife if she should become his widow, there is an obligation upon Mr Fleming, within three months after the date of the contract, to transfer to the trustees fifty shares of the Borneo Company, Limited, now belonging to him, or to which he has acquired right, and a sum of £4000, so far as not already paid—that is, so far as not already paid for these Borneo shares; in the second place, within twelve months he binds himself to effect an insurance on his life to the extent of £500, and to transfer the policy to the trustees, and to pay the premiums. And then there is a declaration that it shall be in the power of Mr Fleming, with consent of the trustees, to sell and dispose of the Borneo shares, and to invest the proceeds thereof in such stock, shares, or other securities as they, the trustees, may think fit; also to allow the policy to drop, and to effect other policies, and so forth. In short, there is a general provision that Mr Fleming and the trustees may alter the investments of the funds in their hands. And with regard to the dividends, bonuses, or annual profits that may be derived from the said Borneo shares or others, the same are to be allowed to accumulate in the hands of the trustees during the life of the said James Nicol Fleming as an additional and further security for the payment of the provisions thereby made in favour of Mrs Fleming, with power to the trustees, if they think proper, to pay Mrs Fleming during her lifetime the proceeds of these securities, or any part of them, exclusive of the jus mariti of Mr Fleming. And then, with regard to the application of the sums to be derived from the Borneo shares and others, and of the sums which may be received by them under the policies of insurance, it is declared that the trustees and their foresaids shall apply the same, and the interest, bonuses, and dividends, and annual profits to be derived therefrom and remaining in their hands—first, to securing payment of the annuity of £1000 a-year; and second, the balance, if any, after setting aside a sum sufficient for securing payment of the annuity, shall, at the death of Mr Fleming, survived by his spouse, be paid, assigned, or disposed to the issue of the marriage; and at the death of Mrs Fleming the sums so set aside to secure payment of her annuity shall be paid, assigned, and made over among the issue of the intended marriage; and in the event of Mrs Fleming predeceasing her husband, and there being no child or children of the marriage, or such children predeceasing her, then the trustees are to pay over the same to Mr Fleming and his assignees; and in the event of there being issue of the marriage at the death of Mrs Fleming, survived by her husband, the trustees are to pay to Mr Fleming the interest, dividends,

June 30, 1881.
Main v. Fleming's Trustees.

and annual profits of the sums in their hands during his life. Now, the effect of this deed is that certain funds are placed in the hands of the trustees, in the first place, as security for the payment of the widow's jointure of £1000 a-year, and the funds which are so used as a security for the payment of that jointure are ultimately to be divided among the children of the marriage. As regards the widow, these funds are a security; as regards the children, the funds become their provision. And, therefore, when the annuity is satisfied and has come to an end, the sums which have been used as security for that annuity are just the divisible fund among the children of the marriage. Of course it might so happen, if the funds became depreciated, that the payment of the annuity to Mrs Fleming might encroach largely on the capital of these funds, and so diminish the amount provided to the children. Now, that being the nature of the trust, let us see what it is alleged occurred after the marriage and before the insolvency of Mr Fleming. It is said that the fifty shares of the Borneo Company were worth about £2500 at the time when the marriage-contract was made, but they yielded large dividends, and from the revenue of the trust the defenders, on 14th May 1863, purchased £1000 Glasgow and South-Western Railway stock, and then again they purchased other stock of the Great Western Railway of Canada worth £1900, and Mr Fleming advanced a certain sum of £1349 to enable them to make up the price of that stock. Then there was an arrangement made between Mr Fleming and the trustees in consequence of his having purchased the estate of Keill, in Argyllshire. He had bought that estate for the sum of £8000 odds, and he wished to make a transaction with the trustees by which in the end they should take the estate of Keill in place of the funds that they then had in their hands, over and above the original Borneo shares. It is needless to go into the details of that arrangement. The estate of Keill was of greater value than the funds in their hands other than the Borneo shares; but an arrangement was made by which they were, out of the revenue of the funds in their hands—which by the trust-deed they were enabled to accumulate—to pay year by year to Mr Fleming so much money until the total price of Keill was repaid to him; and that, we are informed, was finally completed by the year 1876. Then Mr Fleming took a lease—for that was part of the arrangement also—from the trustees of the estate of Keill at a rent of £250 a-year; and having gone to reside there, apparently he proceeded to make very large and important improvements on that estate. That seems to have begun in the year 1865, and therefore there was a good deal of money expended upon the estate before he became insolvent in 1871. But after that date, and when it is alleged he was undoubtedly insolvent, he continued to make large expenditure upon this estate still, and he continued to do so down to the year 1878, when, by the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, his complete insolvency became apparent, and he left the country. Now, the pursuer contends, upon this state of the facts, that by the expenditure which Mr Fleming made upon the estate of Keill, which belongs in property to the trustees, the value of that estate has been largely increased, and the consequence of that is that the trust-estate, including the estate of Keill, has become much more valuable than the original funds put into the hands of the trustees in virtue of the marriage-contract—the consequence of which is not merely that the security is increased for the payment of the annuity, but that there will be a much larger provision for the children of the marriage than was secured to them by the marriage-contract. Now, that is all quite right and proper in so far as Mr Fleming had power to

No. 158.

June 30, 1881.
Main v. Fleming's Trustees.

No. 158. do it, and if he had remained solvent nobody could have found any fault with him for increasing the funds in the hands of the trustees, and so increasing the provision in favour of his children. And down to the year 1871 every shilling that he spent on the estate of Keill does go to increase the value of the estate in the hands of these trustees, and to enlarge the children's provisions. But then the pursuer says, Mr Fleming was not entitled to go on expending money in this way after he became insolvent, because that was simply increasing the provision to his children at the expense of his creditors; and it appears to me that that is quite a sound proposition, and that, so far as this expenditure was made after he became insolvent it was at common law an unlawful thing for him to do—a fraud upon his creditors in the technical sense of the term, although I am not at all inclined to suppose that any actual fraud was intended. Still it is what the common law calls a fraud against his creditors, because it is taking the money that ought to have gone to pay them to increase gratuitously the provision in favour of his own children. No doubt, if that money was thrown away—if it did not in point of practical effect increase the value of the estate in the hands of the trustees, and so increase the money value of the provisions for his children—it would be in vain to attempt to charge any part of that against the defenders. But if the defenders as trustees are lucrati by that expenditure, or, in other words, if the value of the children's provisions is, in point of fact, enhanced by the expenditure of that money, then I apprehend to that extent the pursuer, upon the part of the creditors, has a perfectly equitable claim to participate in the trust-estate which is held by them—in short, the estate comes to be in their hands held in trust, first, to provide the annuity settled in the marriage-contract, and the amount of the funds provided in the marriage-contract to the children of the marriage, but quoad ultra it is a resulting trust in favour of the creditors. And therefore, upon the averments which are before us, which I am not by any means supposing the pursuer will necessarily be able to prove, and which certainly lay upon him a pretty heavy onus probandi—but still, upon these averments, I am quite unable to say that there is not a relevant and good claim made for the trustee of the creditors. And if that be so, I confess I do not see any difficulty in declaring his right in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. It may not be precisely in the very terms of that conclusion, but substantially in terms of that conclusion, that to the extent to which the trust-estate is lucratus by the expenditure of Mr Fleming after he became insolvent the defenders hold for the creditors and their trustee. And therefore I am for recalling the interlocutor, and remitting to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof.

LORD DEAR.—Mr Fleming was sequestrated under the Bankrupt Statutes on the 13th of November 1878, and this is an action by the trustee upon his sequestrated estate. I need not narrate the terms of Mr Fleming's contract of marriage, which was entered into a great many years ago, because your Lordship has very distinctly stated what these are. I shall, therefore, begin by noticing the purchase by him of the estate of Keill, which took place in or about May 1865, at a cost, including expenses connected with it, of £8698. It is stated by the pursuer that in 1865 Mr Fleming was a wealthy man, and that he was solvent till the year 1871. It is also stated that Mr Fleming had begun to lay out money upon the estate at a time when he was perfectly solvent, but it seems to be alleged that he continued that expenditure less or more after he became insolvent in 1871. The summons contains three conclusions, but before entering upon these I may state that I understand the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeds is that he holds the summons to be wholly irrelevant. In that opinion I concur. The first conclusion is that it should be found and declared that the marriage-contract trustees hold the estate of Keill to the extent of £10,000, or such other sum as may be ascertained to be the extent to which it has been improved by Mr Fleming, in trust for the pursuer. That is a sort of conclusion I confess I never saw before, and how it is to be extricated I do not know. They do not hold the estate of Keill in trust for the pursuer to any extent whatever, and my humble opinion is that it is utterly inconsistent with our law of heritable and feudal property to declare in terms of any such conclusion. It is to my mind a conclusion utterly inextricable and inconsistent with any law of Scotland that I know of as to the titles to heritable or feudal property.

Then the second conclusion is that it shall be found and declared that the said sum of £10,000, or such other sum as may be ascertained to be the value of the improvements, forms a real lien and burden in favour of the pursuer as trustee on the sequestrated estate. I think your Lordship is of opinion that that conclusion will not do. I never before saw the attempt made to constitute a real burden by a declaratory conclusion in a summons in place of in the feudal titles, in which we all know it requires to be very carefully and very specifically done. That conclusion, if it could receive effect, would give the trustee a preference. A real burden is always a preferable burden, and that would give him a preference which I think, according to your Lordship's view, he is not entitled to.

The only other conclusion is for payment of the sum of £10,000, with interest thereon at five per cent, or such other sum as may be ascertained to be the extent to which the estate has been improved. Your Lordship has not said anything in favour of that conclusion, and I do not know anything that could be said in favour of it. The Lord Ordinary says in his note:—"There is a petitory conclusion against the defenders for payment of £10,000, but it was not insisted on." It was not insisted on before the Lord Ordinary. I do not recollect anything being said in favour of it here, and as far as I have observed nothing has been said in favour of it as yet by your Lordship. The whole contest, therefore, seems to be upon the first conclusion, which is the only thing left in the summons, to have it declared that to the extent to which the estate may have been improved it is held in trust for behoof of the pursuer as trustee on the bankrupt estate. Now, that does not recommend itself to my mind as an extricable conclusion at all.

Then the first plea in law for the pursuer is—"The trust-estate held by the defenders prior to 1871 having been more than sufficient to secure Mr Fleming's obligations under the marriage-contract libelled, the subsequent expenditure by him on the estate of Keill, while to his own knowledge insolvent, is an alienation struck at by the statute 1621, cap. 18, and a fraud against Mr Fleming's creditors at common law." These are two different things. I heard nothing argued under the statute 1621. The object of an action under the statute 1621 would be to reduce something—some alienation. Neither your Lordship, nor anyone at the bar, has said that there is room for a reduction in this case. Therefore the only thing left under that first plea is, that it is a fraud against the creditors at common law. Now, it may be observed that in the summons

No. 158.

June 30, 1881.

Main v. Fleming's Trustees.

No. 158. there is no allegation that Mr Fleming expended a single shilling in bad faith.

June 30, 1881.

Main v. Fleming's Trustees.

It is said he happened to be insolvent, and he knew he was insolvent when he was going on with what was really an ordinary act of management or administration in improving and thereby utilising the buildings on his estate. It is not said that in this he did anything morally wrong; there is no allegation of that kind. He may have made a mistake in point of law, but how that is to be converted, without any statement to lay a foundation for it, into a fraud at common law, I do not understand, and I did not hear your Lordship say that it is a fraud at common law.

Upon these grounds, I entirely concur with the views of the Lord Ordinary, that supposing there might have been a claim here, no relevant claim or ground of action has been stated in this summons. It is not necessary to go beyond the conclusions of the summons, but I may just make this observation, that it would be a very peculiar kind of conclusion that would bring what was done under any legal objection. Nothing was done, so far as appears, with a fraudulent intention, and the fact is obvious that, whether this estate was improved in value at the time or not, it remains to be seen whether, when the widow and the children come to make their securities available, it will be found of increased market value at all. We can take a proof upon things that have happened, but we cannot take a proof on things that have not happened. We have had instances of much more valuable estates than this, particularly in the west country, that have become totally unsaleable just because of the expensive mansions erected upon them. And if it happens that this estate, when the children have to realise their provisions, has become not worth these provisions, what is to become of the right of the trustee under the sequestration? I do not see my way through that at all. I mention that as a great difficulty and obstacle that may be in the distance, but it is not necessary here to go into it. In my opinion, the Lord Ordinary is right in coming to the result that none of these conclusions are relevant.

LORD MURE.—This case is one of some difficulty, and I have had some hesitation in making up my mind as to the course we ought to pursue. The estate of Keill is held by trustees in security of marriage-contract provisions of an onerous description, which are very clearly declared in the antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Fleming. The estate was given over to the trustees to be held for behoof of the beneficiaries in the marriage-contract, and, together with certain Borneo bonds and policies of insurance, is the capital fund out of which the annuity of £1000 settled upon Mrs Fleming is to be met, while the capital upon her death is to go to the children. Now, that is a trust of a very onerous description, and one which I am satisfied we are bound to take care is not interfered with by any steps proposed to be taken by Mr Fleming's trustee with a view to acquire an interest in the subject-matter of the trust. It is said that after the estate of Keill was acquired Mr Fleming expended a large sum of money upon it, and that he did this after 1871, when he was insolvent. At that time it is said the estate was worth about £11,000, having been purchased for somewhere about £8900. But it is now alleged that by these improvements made upon it, between 1871 and Mr Fleming's bankruptcy in 1878, the estate is increased in value to the extent of £10,000—that is to say, that it is now worth £21,000. And the object of this action is to enable the trustee on Mr Fleming's estate to get the benefit of that expenditure to the extent to which the value of the estate has been increased. Assuming these facts to be proved, the summons contains three different conclusions—one a declarator that the trustees hold the estate in trust to the extent of that excess in value of £10,000. Then there is a conclusion of declarator that the £10,000 forms a real lien or burden in favour of the pursuer as trustee, and if that is not declared, then that the pursuer as trustee on the estate is entitled to immediate payment of £10,000. The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, holding that the pursuer is here in reality seeking a preference which he considers the pursuer was not entitled to in such a question. I am disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the pursuer is not entitled to any preference over the marriage-contract trustees, and, being of that opinion, I concur with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that neither under the second nor the third conclusions can the trustee on the sequestrated estate take any benefit. But I think the Lord Ordinary has been misled as to what the pursuer actually wants, because he assumes throughout in his note that the pursuer asks a preference. It was, however, explained to us during the discussion that that is not what the pursuer wants. The second and third conclusions may perhaps amount substantially to a demand for a preference; but I understand the pursuer does not now ask decree in terms of the second conclusion, or assert any preference as against the marriage-contract trustees. That being the case, the question for decision is, whether under the first conclusion of the action the trustee is in the circumstances fairly entitled to have it ascertained whether there was this excess of value put upon the estate by Mr Fleming's expenditure after his insolvency, and if so, whether, when the marriage-contract provisions are satisfied, the trustee will be entitled to the additional value of the estate? Now, under an action of this sort brought by a trustee to shew that in point of fact there was an expenditure made upon the estate by the bankrupt, which he as trustee for the creditors has a right to claim, subject to any preferences there may be over the estate, I think that the trustee has taken up a position which he is entitled to assume, and that he is entitled to have it cleared up, whether in point of fact Mr Fleming did lay out this large sum of money upon the estate, and whether it has been increased in value to any extent beyond the value of £11,000 which it is admitted it bore at the time when Mr Fleming began the expenditure. And if this conclusion of the summons had gone no further than asking to have it declared that that sum was laid out, and that, upon the marriage-contract provisions being discharged, the trustee would be entitled to the difference between the value of the estate at the time the improvements were begun and the additional value given to it by the improvements, I think he would be entitled to have it so declared. But I have some hesitation whether declaring a trust in terms of this first conclusion of the summons may not go a little further than merely constituting the debt as it were, and entitling the trustee to have the benefit of that increased expenditure after the marriage-contract trustees have discharged their duty under the marriage-contract. If the conclusion were qualified in some way, so as to make it clear that it was only after the marriage-contract provisions had been satisfied that the trustee was to be entitled to take this additional value, I think the rights of the parties would be fairly and properly adjusted under it. I do not therefore object to a proof in order to have the matter inquired into; but I incline to think that this first conclusion of the summons will require to be qualified so as to shew that no trust is to be created in favour of the pursuer to the prejudice of the marriage-contract trustees. And

No. 158.

June 30, 1881.
Main v. Fleming's Trustees.

No. 158. assuming that question to be open for discussion after the proof, I do not object to the course which your Lordship proposes. But I throw out for the consideration of the parties whether they might not qualify the conclusion so as to obviate any difficulty in this respect.

June 30, 1881.

Main v. Fleming's Trustees.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with the majority of your Lordships in thinking that the pursuer is entitled to a proof of his averments in this case, and I entirely agree with the opinion which your Lordship in the chair has delivered. The case is one which seems to me to be really not attended with difficulty. The Lord Ordinary has said at the close of his note :—"The Lord Ordinary decides nothing more than that he (pursuer) is not entitled to the preference which he claims ;" and if the effect of the Lord Ordinary's judgment had been to decide nothing more I would have agreed with him. I am clearly of opinion, with all of your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuer is not entitled to any preference, and therefore that we could not give effect to the second conclusion of the summons. But, on the other hand, I am equally clear that if the pursuer succeeds in proving the facts which he alleges, he is entitled to a decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion. For my part I should be quite content that he should obtain decree in the words in which it is asked, but I can see no objection to adding such words as Lord Mure has suggested. That, however, can be done when the case comes to be disposed of on the proof by the judgment to be then pronounced, if the pursuer shall succeed in proving his averments.

For the purpose of a decision on the relevancy of the case I do not think it necessary to look to any period prior to 1871 ; and to me it is quite immaterial what were the provisions of the marriage-contract relating to the particular purposes for which the trustees held the funds and estate. It is, I think, of no moment in what proportions or in what order the wife or children of the bankrupt were interested in the trust-estate. The fact is this, that the trustees held for the purposes of the trust a property which in 1871 was of the value of £11,000. That I take from the pursuer's statement, which he offers to prove. He says,—“The value of Keill in January 1871 was about £11,000.” Now, it is further alleged that the bankrupt, being of course interested in his own family, for whose behoof the trust was created, proceeded after 1871 to spend £28,000 upon the property. The pursuer says he did so when he was insolvent, and when he knew he was insolvent. Therefore he just spent so much money that was not his own, and which truly belongs to his creditors, on this particular part of the trust-estate. I do not understand it to be disputed that the pursuer's averments would be relevant in the ordinary case of a provision made in favour of a wife or family by one who has afterwards become bankrupt. The creditors in the ordinary case are entitled at common law to be restored against such an act by the bankrupt done in the knowledge of his insolvency. Suppose that, instead of laying out the money upon this estate, Mr Fleming had, in the knowledge of his insolvency, handed to trustees £10,000 for the purposes of their trust, being under no obligation to make any such payment, and they had invested the money upon heritable bonds, and the bonds remained ear-marked at the date of the sequestration, can it be disputed that the trustee on the estate would be entitled to require that the money should be paid back to him for behoof of the creditors to whom it belongs ? I think that is too clear to require argument or observation. Well, the case is not quite in that position. The money cannot be identified or got back in the clear and easy way in which it No. 158.

might be recovered in the case I have supposed. But the pursuer says that June 30, 1881 after and by means of the £28,000 which was expended on Keill the estate in Main v. Fleming's Trustees the hands of the defender has been increased in value to the extent of £10,000.
What is the result of that? The result is that, assuming the property to have retained its value, there is £10,000 of the creditors' money in that estate at this moment, just as there would be £10,000 in the hands of the trustees if the money had been handed over to them and invested as in the case I have supposed. It appears to be the consequence of that state of matters that there is a resulting trust in the trustees to the extent of this £10,000 for behoof of the creditors of Mr Fleming. The trustees are feudally vested in this property, but what they are entitled to is £11,000 for their own trust, while Mr Fleming's creditors have right to the sum of £10,000, or such other sum as shall appear to be the amount by which the value of the property has been enhanced by the expenditure. The fact that the different funds have been mixed up by having been spent, one part in buying the property and another in permanently improving it, cannot give the beneficiaries the right to retain money not their own. The pursuer's right must be extricated in some way. He asks a proof in order to shew that the trustees are holding money belonging to the creditors which has been sunk in this property, and I confess I have never been able to see any reason, and I do not see any reason now, why he should not be allowed to prove that this is the fact, and that the expenditure thus increased the value of the property as he alleges. Having proved his averments, I think he would be entitled to decree in terms of this declaratory conclusion—as I have said already unqualifiedly—but if it be thought safer, to make the matter clear, that it should be qualified in some way so as to save the rights of the wife and children under the marriage-contract provisions, good and well, that may be done.
The right, it appears to me, would neither be one of preference nor of a postponed nature, but of a pari passu nature to the extent to which it is made out.
It is unnecessary to inquire what may be the next steps. The pursuer must make it clear that the facts are as he alleges; but I can only say, for my own part, that assuming this to be made out, then, whether the subsequent procedure is to be worked out by giving the pursuer a decree against the trustees to find the money, or by requiring them at a suitable time to sell the property or to grant a marketable security over it, the pursuer will, I think, be entitled to have matters somehow put in such a shape that he shall have the fund belonging to the sequestrated estate made available for division among the creditors.

On these grounds, and taking the case as one in which a preference is not now insisted in, I am clearly of opinion that a proof ought to be allowed.

Counsel for the pursuer then called attention to the 62d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868,* and suggested that a remit to a Lord Ordinary was incompetent, and that the proof must be taken before one of the Judges of the First Division.

* "The 3d section of the Act 29 and 30 Vict., cap. 112, is hereby amended to the effect of providing that, notwithstanding the terms of the said section, 'Where proof shall be ordered by one of the Divisions of the Court,' it shall no longer be competent to remit to one of the Lords Ordinary to take such proof, but it shall be taken before any one of the Judges of the said Division, whose place may for the time be supplied by one of the Lords Ordinary called in for that occasion."

No. 158. At advising.—

June 30, 1881. LORD PRESIDENT.—We have conferred with the Second Division on this point of practice, and we are of opinion that the 62d section of the Act of 1868 does not apply. It applies to cases in which a Division orders a proof to be taken, but here we are merely going to recall an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary dismissing an action. The case will then proceed as if that interlocutor had never been pronounced, and the next step will be to send the case to probation. This has often been done.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof before answer."

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 159.

THOMAS CAMPBELL BURTON, Pursuer.—Macdonald—Lang.
ROBERT MOORHEAD, Defender.—Guthrie Smith—Shaw.

July 1, 1881.
Burton v.
Moorhead.

Reparation—Liability of owner of dog for damage.—Held that the owner of a dog, known by him to be ferocious, is bound to take, not only reasonable, but effectual, precautions against its attacking the public, and that, in the event of the precautions taken proving insufficient, he will be liable in damages to the injured person.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

IN December 1880 Thomas Campbell Burton, professor of dancing, Glasgow, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court there against Robert Moorhead, commission agent, Glasgow, concluding for damages to the extent of £150 in respect of injuries alleged to have been inflicted on him by a dog belonging to the defender.

The pursuer averred that—(Cond. 2) "On 29th May last pursuer, whilst proceeding past the defender's house at Craigielinn, Paisley, along with Mr Quin, contractor, Glasgow, was attacked and severely bitten on the left leg, near the ankle, by a dog belonging to the defender, which was allowed to be loose or insufficiently guarded or secured." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer in no way interfered with the said dog, which was well known to the defender to be a vicious, ferocious, and dangerous animal."

He pleaded;—(1) The defender's dog having bitten pursuer, the defender is liable in reparation, in respect that there was no fault on the part of pursuer, and said dog was vicious, ferocious, and dangerous. (2) There being culpa on the part of defender, or those for whom he is responsible, in not having the said dog sufficiently attended or secured, the defender is liable to pursuer for the injuries sustained.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been trespassing when he suffered the injuries complained of, he has no right of action. (2) The pursuer having provoked the defender's watch-dog, he is not entitled to recover damages.

A proof was led on January 18, 1881, from which it appeared that Mr Moorhead's house was situated near Paisley, about 300 yards back from the public road, and that access was obtained to it by means of a private road leading from the public road past the house towards the new water-works for Paisley. Close by this road was a kennel in which the defender kept a watch-dog chained. Much evidence was led as to the temper of the dog, but eventually the Sheriff-substitute found, and it was hardly disputed on appeal, that the dog was of a savage character, that it had bitten several people, and that the defender had been put on his guard as to its propensity to attack people. The dog was secured by a chain attached to a ring passing through a staple driven into the ground. It appeared that on 29th May the pursuer and his wife were on their way to inspect the Paisley waterworks, having been invited to do so by Mr Quin, contractor for the said works, who had advised them to go by the defender's private road, as being the shortest and least steep. The pursuer and his wife were in a gig belonging to Mr Quin, who was to join them at the works. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether Mr Quin had permission to use the private road, and to give others leave to do so. No. 159.

July 1, 1881.
Burton v.
Moorhead.

Mr Quin, in his evidence, deponed—"On the date in question, the 29th of May, I had invited Mr and Mrs Burton to see the works, and I drove them out as far as the hill foot, up to the end of Mr Moorhead's house. I told them to drive round by the house, the nearest and easiest way. I had some business which took me up the other way. It is a much easier ascent than the other way. I had frequently driven the way I sent them. It takes them past the end of Mr Moorhead's house, and on to the works, round the back of the house. That was not the only occasion on which I had any stranger with me, this time, the 29th of May, that Mr and Mrs Burton were with me. (Q.) You had availed yourself of the road frequently? (A.) I took full permission of the road. That was by Mr Moorhead's direction. He did not put any restriction upon me as to the use of that side road."

In cross-examination he further deponed—" (Q.) Did Mr Moorhead allow you to give permission to other people to go (by the private road) as well as to go yourself? (A.) From what he said I took it for granted that I had permission, and I took all my friends that way, and I took the water commissioners up, and Mr Sharpe. (Q.) Did you ever send any other body that way when you were not going yourself? (A.) I am not very sure, but I would if I were sending them direct to the work. If I had nothing else to do I would send them. (Q.) Did you understand Mr Moorhead had given you permission to invite people to go that way when you were not going yourself? (A.) Certainly he did; and I told my foreman to go that way. It was understood we had full permission to go that way. I understood that."

Mr Moorhead, in cross-examination, said—"I have heard to-day what the witness M'Leod said, and also what Mr Quin said, as to my having granted permission to them to use that road in their visit to the works. I never granted permission to either of them. I say, positively, I never granted permission to either. (Q.) Then you say their statement is untrue? (A.) I was never asked permission. Had I been asked I might have granted it, up to a certain point. I never was asked, and I most certainly never gave, liberty. I think I only saw Mr Quin once on my property. We had a few passing words, I daresay. We had none whatever about this road."

As Mr and Mrs Burton were driving up the private road, Mr Burton got down from the gig and walked to rest the horse. As he passed, the watch dog flew out upon him, broke its chain, and bit the pursuer severely on the leg. It was not proved that the pursuer had in any way wantonly irritated the animal.

Much evidence was led as to the strength of the chain, the effect of which was to shew that it looked strong and was in fact sufficiently strong to hold in the dog on ordinary occasions.

On January 27, 1881, the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that on 29th May 1880, the pursuer was passing along a private road leading past the defender's house to the water-works, in course of construction for the burgh of Paisley, and that said road led near a kennel, at which there was chained a retriever dog

No. 159.

July 1, 1881.
Burton v.
Moorhead.

belonging to the defender, and kept by him there as a watch-dog: Finds that the said dog was of a most savage character, and that it had bitten several people, and that the defender had been put on his guard as to its propensity to attack people: Finds that in these circumstances it was incumbent on him to take all proper precautions for the safety of people having occasion to pass along said road: Finds that the precautions adopted by the defender were, that the dog was secured by a chain attached at one end to its collar, and at the other to a ring passing through a staple driven into the ground: Finds that on the occasion in question the dog sprang so violently towards the pursuer that one of the links of its chain snapped, whereon it rushed on the pursuer and bit him severely: Finds that the said chain had been in use for two years, had been bought as a new chain, and as being of sufficient strength to restrain the dog, that apparently to the eye it was sufficient for this purpose, and that it has never before nor since 29th May given way: Finds, therefore, that the precautions taken by the defender were reasonably sufficient: Finds, in these circumstances, as matter of law, that the defender is not responsible to the pursuer for the injuries he has sustained through the unexpected fracture of the dog's chain: Therefore assails the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Clark), who, on 5th April 1881, pronounced an interlocutor recalling the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, on the ground that the occurrence took place through the failure of the defender to provide a chain sufficiently strong for the purpose intended, and assessing the damages at £50.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for defender;—The pursuer was on a private road, and had no right to be there, or at least was there by the kindness of the defender. That being so, the negligence proved against the defender must be of the grossest kind.¹ The dog in this case was not of an unusually ferocious character as in the case of Renwick v. Von Rotberg.² Besides, the defender was quite entitled to keep such a dog on his premises provided he took proper and reasonable precautions to restrain it, as he had done in this case.

Argued for pursuer;—The owner of a dog, known by him to be ferocious, was not only bound to take reasonable precautions to restrain it, but to take effectual precautions. If his precautions did not prove effectual, however sufficient they might appear to have been, he would be responsible for any damage resulting from their insufficiency.³ The pursuer had reasonable cause to suppose that he might be on the private road, and that being so, he was entitled to insist in this action for damages.⁴

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are two grounds on which the Sheriff's judgment is assailed, first, that the pursuer had no right to be where he was, and that, therefore, the obligation on the owner of the dog was not so strong as it would otherwise have been, and second, that the owner took all reasonable precautions to restrain this dog, and that the chain having broken from unsuspected causes, he was discharged from all responsibility. In regard to the first ground, I do not think that the evidence bears out the contention. Mr Quin

¹ Moffat v. Bateman, December 14, 1869, 3 L. R. Priv. C., App. 115; Shearman on Negligence, 580, sec. 498.

² Renwick v. Von Rotberg, July 2, 1875, ante, vol. ii., 855.

³ Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 430; May v. Burdett, June 2, 1846, 9 Ad. and Ellis, 101; Addison on Torts, 113; Cowan v. Dalziel, November 23, 1877, ante, vol. v., 241.

⁴ Sarch v. Blackburn, February 24, 1830, 4 Carr and Payne, 297.

says that he had leave to go on to this private road, and also had leave to take anybody with him that he chose, and used that right without restriction by the owner. I do not quite understand the discrepancy between Moorhead and Quin's testimony, but still it is clear that Quin did go on to that road without interference of the owner, and took persons with him; therefore when he took the pursuer with him the pursuer was not a trespasser, but had, on the contrary, reasonable grounds to believe that he was doing what he was entitled to do. For my own part, if I were obliged to balance Quin's evidence against Moorhead's, I should be inclined, in the circumstances, to prefer Quin's; but I give no decided opinion on that point. If there were any difference between a person having a right to be on the road and one who has not, still I think the pursuer would be entitled to prevail on the ground of the owner's tolerance.

No. 159.

July 1, 1881.
Burton v.
Moorhead.

The second question is more important, and if the liability of the defender depended on his having taken reasonable precautions to restrain the dog I should think that he had very good grounds to prevail.

But that view depends, I think, on a misapprehension of the true principle of his duty. It seems agreed that where an owner of a dog has no reason to suppose that it is ferocious the mere fact that it has turned out to be so would not make him liable for anything it has done; the dog has in fact the privilege of one worry. But when the ferocity of the dog is quite well known to the owner his obligation is not one of reasonable care, but not to keep the dog at all, unless he does it in such a way as to make it perfectly secure. The distinction is most clear, and therefore the owner of the dog keeps it entirely at his own risk. He does not undertake that he will restrain the animal, but he must restrain, and, if he does not, he will be responsible for its acts. The following passage in Lord Hale's Pleas of the Crown shews the distinction clearly, for under the old English law what will save a man from a criminal prosecution will not save him from a civil action of damages. He says,—“If a man have a beast, as a bull, cow, horse, or dog, used to hurt people, if the owner know not his quality he is not punishable, but if the owner be acquainted with his quality, and keeps him not up from doing harm, and the beast kills a man, by the ancient Jewish law the owner was to die for it. . . . If the owner have notice of the quality of his beast, and it doth anybody hurt, he is chargeable with an action for it. Though he have no particular notice that he did any such thing before, yet if it be a beast that is feræ naturæ, as a lion, a bear, a wolf, gnu, an ape or monkey, if he get loose and do harm to any person, the owner is liable to an action for the damage, and so I knew it adjudged in Andrew Baker's case, whose child was bit by a monkey that broke his chain and got loose. And therefore in case of such a wild beast, or in case of a bull or cow that doth damage where the owner knows of it, he must at his peril keep him up safe from doing hurt, for though he use his diligence to keep him up, if he escapes and do harm the owner is liable to answer damages. But as to the point of felony, if the owner have notice of the quality of the ox, &c., and use all due diligence to keep him up, yet the ox breaks loose and kills a man, this is no felony in the owner, but the ox is a deodand. But if he did not use that due diligence, but through negligence the beast goes abroad, after warning or notice of his condition, and kills a man, I think it is manslaughter in the owner.”

That precisely covers the case here, and brings out the distinction clearly between a man doing what is lawful in a neglectful manner, and a man doing what is unlawful, except on the condition of taking all the risk on himself.

No. 159.

July 1, 1881.
Burton v.
Moorhead.

LORD YOUNG.—I entirely concur; and I think the case is very important. The Sheriff-substitute finds as matter of fact “that the said dog was of a most savage character, and that it had bitten several people;” and the Sheriff finds that the dog was “a powerful and ferocious dog.” Now, there is no necessity for a man to keep an animal of this kind—dangerous to human beings; there is no more necessity for him to keep it than there is to keep a wild animal. He may lawfully keep it, but he keeps it at his own risk; he is not only bound and obliged to use diligence, or, as the Sheriff-substitute says, “to take precautions which are reasonably sufficient” to restrain the dog; but the risk shall be entirely his, and the precautions he takes must be effectual. If they are not, the owner is responsible. That is the law, and it is well set forth in the passage from Hale’s Pleas of the Crown your Lordship has quoted. If it be a wild animal, or an ordinary domestic animal which is dangerous to human beings, the keeper shall not discharge himself of his obligation by using diligence, which in fact turned out to be ineffectual. It is different when there is a criminal question in the matter, and not merely one of damages, for when a man is sought to be made criminally responsible, then the question of reasonable diligence will be entertained. I concur in all the findings of the Sheriff-substitute as summarised by the Sheriff, with the exception of the finding as to the reasonably sufficient precautions. I think the precautions must be effectual, and not only reasonably sufficient, in the sense that though they were not effectual the owner was morally excusable. The reason of our judgment is that ineffectual precautions are no defence to an action for injuries done to a person, where he lawfully was, by a ferocious animal.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Find that the dog in question was ferocious and dangerous, and known to be so by the appellant (defender): Find that the dog was kept on the chain, but that this chain was insufficient to render the dog secure, and that the chain broke, and the dog getting loose, bit the respondent (pursuer) severely: Find that the respondent was where he was entitled to be at the time of this occurrence: Therefore dismiss the appeal, approve the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and decern.”

MACBRAIR & KEITH, S.S.C.—RHIND, LINDSAY, & WALLACE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 160.

MRS MARGARET WHITE AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Gillespie.

July 5, 1881.
White, &c. v.
Dickson, &c.

THOMAS DICKSON AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Appellants).—Party.

Interdict—Publication—Private Correspondence.—It is a question of circumstances whether the Court will grant an interdict against the publication of private letters by the receiver.

A person having informed certain of his wife’s relations that he intended to publish for circulation among his friends a private correspondence between himself and his wife and them, they presented a petition for interdict against the publication. The Court, after examining the letters, refused to grant interdict.

Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that if, by the publication of the correspondence any injury was done, the mere fact that interdict had been refused in the present action would not shield the person publishing it from the consequences of his act.

In September 1880, in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, Mrs Margaret Marshall or White, Stanley Street, Glasgow, and others, presented a petition against Thomas Dickson, and his wife Mrs Calderhead Eadie White or Dickson, in which they prayed the Court "to interdict the defenders and either of them from circulating or publishing a pamphlet headed 'Correspondence between Mrs White, Miss White, Mr and Mrs Begg, Mr Thomson, and others, and Mr and Mrs Dickson, also record in action raised in Sheriff Court, with shorthand writer's notes of the proof taken, and Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor,' and commencing with a letter from the pursuer, Jane Calderhead Begg, dated Monday evening, and from otherwise making public said pamphlet or any letters written by the pursuers or any of them to the defenders or either of them, without the consent of the several pursuers, the writers of said letters."

No. 160.
July 5, 1881.
White, &c. v.
Dickson, &c.
2D DIVISION
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

From the condescendence annexed to the petition it appeared that the pursuer, Mrs White, was the mother, and the other pursuers the sisters and brothers-in-law of the defender, Mrs Dickson.

The pursuers averred, inter alia,—" (3) The defender, T. Dickson, has recently written to the pursuer, Mrs White, intimating his intention to publish, and intends to publish, a pamphlet headed 'Correspondence between Mrs White, Miss White, Mr and Mrs Begg, Mr Thomson and others, and Mr and Mrs Dickson; also record in action raised in Sheriff-Court, with shorthand writer's notes of the proof taken, and Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor.' He sent to said pursuers a proof copy of the first eight pages of said pamphlet, along with a letter dated 21st September 1880. (4) The defender, T. Dickson, has not obtained the pursuers' consent to the publication of any letters by them to the defenders or either of them. On the contrary, the pursuers wholly object to such publication. (5) The whole letters written by the pursuers to the defenders are of a private character. It will be hurtful to their feelings if said letters are made public, and no useful purpose is to be served by such a publication. (7) In the eight pages of proof sent by the defender T. Dickson to the pursuer, Mrs White, there are (1) a private note from the pursuer, Mrs Begg, to said defender, and (2) four private letters from the pursuer, Mrs White,—two to the defender Thomas Dickson, and two to the defender Mrs Dickson."

The defenders averred, inter alia,—"That the pursuers had shewn to friends portions of the correspondence. "The only course, therefore, which is open to the defenders for the vindication of Mrs Dickson's character is to circulate this correspondence among those relatives and intimate friends who know of the said estrangement. For this purpose the defenders are at present getting fifty copies of the correspondence printed in order that it may be more easily read, as it is very voluminous, and they intend to give a copy of the same to all those friends and relatives who are wholly or partially acquainted with the circumstances. The defenders have no interest—and they have certainly no intention—of spreading the matter further; and they do not purpose giving away more than the said fifty copies. . . . The copy record referred to in the petition is that of an action which depended publicly in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow. The greater part of the letters referred to in the present action were produced therein."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders intending to publish, without consent of the pursuers, private letters written by the latter, the pursuers are entitled to interdict, with expenses, all as craved. (2) The defences are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action, quoad future letters, is incompetent. (2) The action is irrelevant, and, particularly, the action quoad

No. 160. the copy record referred to, and the letters produced in the said action, is irrelevant. (3) The circulation of the said pamphlet being limited, as above set forth, and being for the vindication of the character of the defender, Mrs Dickson, the interdict should be recalled, and the defenders found entitled to expenses. (4) Generally, in the circumstances, the pursuers' material averments being unfounded in fact, the interdict should be recalled, and the pursuers found liable to the defenders in expenses.

July 5, 1881.
White, &c. v.
Dickson, &c.

Interim interdict was granted, and on 30th November 1880 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the defenders had not stated any relevant defences, and making the interdict perpetual.*

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Clark) who, on 10th February 1881, for the reasons assigned by the Sheriff-substitute, adhered.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session.¹

At advising,—

Lord Young.—The parties here are related to one another by marriage, and I think that that being so the whole matter is much to be regretted. The mother of the appellant's wife seems to have objected to the marriage, and never to have taken kindly to her son-in-law. It seems that after the marriage the appellant brought an action in the Sheriff Court in his own and his wife's name against his relations by marriage for recovery of certain articles alleged to belong to his wife, which action is referred to in the correspondence, and with which the correspondence is to a considerable extent taken up. The appellant now proposes, in order to inform his friends of the exact state of affairs, to print and circulate a pamphlet headed "A Correspondence between Mrs White" and others, "and Mr and Mrs Dickson; also record in action raised in Sheriff Court, with shorthand writer's notes of the proof taken, and Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor." He communicated his intention to his mother-in-law, sending her the first eight pages of the pamphlet in proof, and saying that it was not his

* "NOTE.— . . . The law as to the right of the writer of a private letter is simple. It appears from a modern English authority (Oliver v. Oliver, 11 C. B. N. S. 139), as it may also be gathered from the Scotch cases on the subject reported in Morrison's Appendix, s. v. Literary Property, Nos. 1 and 4, that the receiver has a property in the manuscript,—in the ipsam corpus of the letter, but that he has no right to alter its nature, or use it otherwise than as a manuscript. See also Gee v. Pritchard, 1818, 2 Swanst. 402; Percival v. Phipps, 2 Ves. and B. 28; Bell's Princ. 1357.

"I am of opinion that the printing for private circulation, however limited, of letters of a personal nature passing between relations and friends is within this principle, for if it once be held that a man may print such letters for circulation within a limited circle, it is impossible to draw a line at which such circulation becomes objectionable. To hold otherwise would be to involve the tribunals in endless inquiries into delicate matters which in this country have happily been left to the good sense and good feeling of the persons concerned, except where relevant charges of slander are made.

"This being so, the defenders are not entitled to print the pursuer's letters as they propose to do, either separately or along with other matter. The pamphlet complained of includes such letters, and is, therefore, in its intended form, a unum quid, which is an infringement of the pursuers' legal rights.

"The defenders founded on the case of Percival v. Phipps, as supporting their contention that they are entitled to circulate the pamphlet for the vindication of character. That case, however, is very special in its circumstances, and differs from this materially, in so far as the question related to publications in public prints, in which the party complaining had taken the initiative."

¹ Authorities.—Davis v. Miller, July 5, 1855, 17 D. 1050, 27 Scot. Jur. 542, and cases in Sheriff-substitute's note.

intention to omit anything whatever in all that might be printed, however much the omissions might be a saving of expense to him. He now says that it is for himself to judge of the prudence of the course he proposes, if the law allows him to take it, and he thinks that it concerns him to make his friends acquainted with the facts, as shewn by the correspondence and the legal proceedings. The Sheriff-substitute, being of opinion that such publication would be a violation of private confidence, interdicted him. Now, I am of opinion that by this publication the defender is not violating any right belonging to the pursuers. Generally speaking, a party is quite entitled to print or publish any proceedings, including correspondence, in a cause before the Courts, and there are many cases in which this has been done, where the parties thought it best to do so. I have seen many such cases myself. It is a novel proposition to me that this is against any right of the parties who do not wish to publish. Undoubtedly the publication of a correspondence of a literary character may be interdicted on the plea of infringement of copyright. For instance, a literary man travelling abroad may send accounts of his travels in the form of letters to a friend with or without the view of future publication. Then, if it was made known that his friend wished to publish these letters, the writer might get an interdict against the recipient, prohibiting him from doing so, on the ground of literary copyright. There might be imagined many other cases of a similar kind, but we need not stay to conceive such imaginary cases, as we have nothing to do with them here. I have looked through the letters which the appellant proposes to print here, and I am of opinion that there is no law to stop him from doing so. I have my own view of the prudence and expediency of the course proposed, but I allow that the party must be allowed to judge for himself of that. All that I can say is that the law does not interpose to prevent him publishing these letters if he chooses. I think the judgments appealed against ought to be set aside, and the petition dismissed.

No. 160.

July 5, 1881.
White, &c. v.
Dickson, &c.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—In this case the respondents in the appeal, who were the petitioners before the Sheriff, ask interdict against the proposed publication by the appellants of letters which were written by the respondents to the appellants, and that interdict has been granted by the Sheriff. Hence the present appeal.

The question is one of importance; for, on the one hand it would be to be regretted were it the law that any letter written on the faith of confidential communication might as a matter of course, and notwithstanding the opposition of the writer, be published to the world. On the other hand, it would be a hard and unreasonable rule were it the case that even though the writer could not in any way be injured, and though the receiver has a reasonable purpose to serve, the opposition of the former is an absolute bar to publication. Law and the reason of the thing is to be found between these two extremes; and when I say the law, I mean to express what is my understanding not only of the rule recognised in Scotland, but of that also which is observed in England. The reason of the rule, indeed, appears not to be the same in the two countries. "In England," Professor Bell says (Principles, par. 1356), "it is on the ground of property alone; in Scotland, on the ground chiefly of just and expedient interference for the protection of reputation." Lord Chancellor Eldon, it may be observed, in deciding the case of Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 402, while recognising the fact that such is the ground upon which the English doctrine was founded, did not speak of that ground as one which to his mind was satisfactory;

No. 160. but as the interests of those concerned had been, and might continue to be, protected upon that basis, he was not disposed to part with it, seeing difficulties might arise in adopting a new foundation for rules requiring to be maintained. July 5, 1881. White, &c. v. Dickson, &c. What is more important is, that he looked upon cases in which an injunction against the publication of private letters was sought as cases of circumstances. In other words, there is in England no hard or fast line to which decisions in this department must be squared, and the results in Percival v. Phipps, in which the injunction was refused, and in the earlier case of Gee v. Pritchard, in which it was granted, may be cited in illustration. The views of our law upon this question, as well as the reasons on which it rests, as expressed by Professor Bell in his Commentaries, i., 111, 112, 7th ed., are entitled to great consideration. Mr Bell says, with regard to the publication of private letters—“In Scotland the Court of Session is held to have jurisdiction by interdict to protect not property merely, but reputation and even private feelings, from outrage and invasion. In one respect the publication of private letters may outrage both; and the question has been, whether, where private letters have been written and sent to a correspondent, the author by sending them to his friend authorises him to disseminate them or publish them for gain. Now, the purpose of the communication is quite different. It rather implies a veto on publication. Compositions for the public and those for the eye of a friend are in a different spirit. It is one of the great charms of epistolary correspondence that one writes not under the awe of a misjudging world, but throws out unscrupulously his genuine and undisguised sentiments, utters his most secret thoughts, and with as little reserve, as in the secrecy of his own chamber, expresses his feelings of affection, or his murmurs of disapprobation and of censure, in full reliance that they are confided to a friendly ear. By the publication of such effusions—confidential, careless, unthinking of consequences—a man may be wounded in his tenderest part, his literary reputation hurt, his character traduced. It is accordingly the understood or implied condition of the communication—the implied limitation of the right conferred—that such communications are not to be published. With these natural feelings on the breach of epistolary confidence the determinations of the Court of Session have accorded.”

Where, however, none of these results can reasonably be contemplated from publication, and where, besides, there is a legitimate interest in the receiver to publish, the Court ought not and will not interfere to prevent publication. All questions of literary property are of course outside the present controversy. These, when they arise, will be dealt with on their merits, and must probably be decided upon other considerations.

These being my views of the law, which, I may add, are not in any way inconsistent with the cases reported in Morrison's Appendix, voce “Literary Property,” Nos. 1 and 4, to which the Sheriff has referred, I concur in thinking that the interdict prayed for ought not to have been granted, and that, having been granted by the Sheriff, it ought now to be recalled. The respondents will not be injured, and the appellants may be, and think they will be, benefited by the publication. I regret that the appellants insist upon their right. Much better would it be for them, and for all who are concerned in the family embroglio, to forbear, but, as I think, there is no ground in law on which they can be prevented.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur entirely in the judgment proposed by your Lordships. The question of granting an interdict is always a matter for the discretion of the Court, and I do not think that it should be granted here. I concur in thinking that there is no question of property here involved. The holder of the correspondence is, in the first instance, master of the letters. If he uses them to the prejudice of the parties who wrote them or others he will be responsible, but the question here for us to decide is whether it is so plain that such injury will be done to the pursuers by the publishing of these letters that we should interdict the appellant from doing so. My view of the matter is very clearly set forth by Lord Eldon in the case cited by Lord Craighill. If the appellant does injury to any one by the publication, and if that is proved, the mere fact that we have refused the interdict will not save him from the consequences of his act. I should like to add my tribute of advice in this case, and to put it to the appellant whether it would not be more wise if he let this petty matter rest where it is, and not proceed to carry out his intention of publishing the correspondence, even though we have found him entitled to do so if he likes.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff's judgment, and dismissed the petition.

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—CHARLES S. TAYLOR, S.S.C.—Agents.

ALEXANDER C. MACPHERSON, Pursuer.—Shaw.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—R. Johnstone.

No. 161.

July 6, 1881.
Macpherson v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Jury Trial—Place and time of trial.—Issues were adjusted for the trial of an action of damages against the Caledonian Railway Company at the instance of A. C. Macpherson, for injuries sustained in a railway accident at Pennilee, on the Greenock section of the Caledonian Railway, near Glasgow. The only question between the parties related to the amount of damages, liability being admitted.

The pursuer proposed that the trial should be at the Autumn Circuit at Glasgow, and had therefore not given notice for the July sittings in Edinburgh.

The defenders now moved to have the case tried in Edinburgh, because a trial there (1) would be less costly, as was shewn by the account of expenses in a case arising out of the same accident which had been tried at the previous Glasgow Circuit; and (2) would be more impartial, as the community of Glasgow and neighbourhood were affected unfavourably to the defenders, and a number of that section of the public from whom the jury would be chosen were season-ticket holders upon the line.

The Court held that no sufficient grounds had been set forth for granting the motion.

CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

ROBERT CARSWELL, Pursuer.—Mackay—Graham Murray.

MARTHA SWAN OR CARSWELL, Defender.

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

Husband and Wife—Divorce for desertion—Foreign—Jurisdiction—Domicile.—A Canadian married a Canadian wife in Canada. The wife deserted her husband there in 1873, and subsequently refused to adhere. The husband came to Scotland in 1879, and in 1880 raised an action of divorce on the ground of wilful and malicious desertion, averring that he was now domiciled in Scotland. In proof of this averment he deposed that he had abandoned Canada as his home, and had come to reside with his children in Edinburgh; that he had bought a business there, and that his present intention was to remain in Scotland as his home; that one

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.2D DIVISION.
Lord Lea.
B.

main reason of his leaving Canada was his desire to obtain a divorce, which he could not get by the law of Canada. The action was undefended. Held (1) that the pursuer had proved a domicile in Scotland; and therefore (2) that the husband's domicile was that of his wife; and therefore (3) that the Court had jurisdiction to pronounce decree of divorce.

In July 1880 Robert Carswell, a Canadian by birth, residing at 10 Warrender Park Road East, Edinburgh, brought an action of divorce against his wife, Martha Swan or Carswell, "now in America, or elsewhere furth of Scotland, and whose place of residence is unknown to the pursuer," on the ground of wilful and malicious non-adherence and desertion.

From the pursuer's statements it appeared that he was lawfully married to the defender, also a Canadian by birth, on 31st August 1866, at Sydney, in the province of Ontario, Dominion of Canada, and that they lived there together as husband and wife down to March 1873. That at that date the defender had deserted him, and had refused to come back to him, although he had repeatedly asked her to return.

The 4th article of the pursuer's condescendence was in the following terms:—"In the autumn of 1877 the pursuer resolved to dispose of his business of law bookseller in Toronto, or to enter into such a partnership as would leave him free to transfer his residence to Scotland. On 11th September 1877 negotiations for a partnership of this kind were commenced, and they were completed in October 1878. In February 1879 the pursuer visited Edinburgh, with the view of establishing a business there, and took and furnished the house 3 Warrender Park Terrace. In June 1879 the pursuer went to Canada, and returned in October with his children, the said Martha Roberta Carswell and John Carswell, and also Emeline Carswell, his daughter by his first wife. He then took on lease the shop 11 St Giles Street, Edinburgh, of which the lease runs until Whitsunday 1885. He has lately purchased the whole law library and law business of Mr James Stillie, Hanover Street, Edinburgh. The said children reside with the pursuer, and are being educated in Edinburgh. It is the intention of the pursuer to reside permanently with his children in Edinburgh, and to carry on business there, and he has no intention of returning to Canada. The pursuer has thus acquired a Scotch domicile."

He then went on to state that since establishing himself in business in Edinburgh he had made strenuous efforts to ascertain the present residence of his wife that he might have an opportunity of again requesting her to return to him and live with him as his wife, but that these efforts had been unsuccessful.

He pleaded;—(1) On the facts stated, and, in particular, the pursuer having acquired a Scotch domicile, the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. (2) The pursuer is entitled to divorce the defender for wilful desertion. (3) The defender having been guilty of wilful and malicious non-adherence to and desertion of the pursuer for the space of four years, the pursuer is entitled to decree of divorce as concluded for.

The action was undefended.

On 18th November 1880 the Lord Ordinary, on the motion of counsel for the pursuer, that the summons be found relevant, and the pursuer allowed a proof of his averments, reported the case to the Second Division.*

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary reports this cause, because it appears to him that the allegations of the pursuer disclose a case of an unusual character, and raise questions of importance which, in the present state of the authorities, ought not to be decided in favour of the pursuer without the sanction of the Court. It was admitted by the pursuer's counsel that no case could be cited in which an action of divorce for desertion had been sustained against a defender

On 17th November 1880 the Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow proof before answer, both on the question of jurisdiction and of desertion. No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

who has never been in Scotland, and who, so far as appears, has had no notice of her husband's removal to this country, and of his requirement that she should here give her adherence to him.

"According to the averments in the condescendence, the pursuer and defender were married in Canada in 1866. Neither of the parties appears to have had any connection with Scotland either at that time or during their cohabitation as married persons. Their residence, from the time of the marriage down to 1873, was in Toronto, where the pursuer carried on business as a law bookseller. In 1873 the defender separated herself from her husband, and he states that although he subsequently saw her and cohabited with her in a lodging which she had taken, she declined all proposals that she should return to live with him. In 1875 he sued her in the Courts of Toronto for the custody of two children of the marriage. At that time, therefore, he appears to have recognised her as having in Canada a separate persona standi in judicio. An attempt was made at that time, he says, at reconciliation, but she was irreconcilable, and from that time he has not seen her. The only communication which he has since received from her is the letter, or sheet of verses, No. 38 of process, dated from St Louis, Missouri, in February 1879. In 1879 he came to Edinburgh, and commenced business there as a law bookseller. He produces a contract of copartnership (No. 7 of process), from which it appears that the business in Edinburgh is a branch of the business of a Toronto copartnership, to which he transferred his business in Canada, and of which he is still the leading partner. He alleges, however, that it is his intention to reside permanently in Edinburgh, and that he has thus acquired a Scotch domicile. He has resided in Edinburgh since October 1879. His wife appears never to have been in Scotland; and he alleges, notwithstanding strenuous efforts, he has been unable to ascertain her present residence. Certain documents have been produced by him in support of this allegation, which may be held to afford prima facie evidence that she was last heard of in California, working in a photographer's establishment, and that his agents in America have failed to make delivery to her of a letter dated 21st May 1880, requiring her to come to Scotland, and live with him as wife.

"In this state of matters it is obvious that the question whether the non-adherence of the wife has resulted from 'malicious and obstinate defection' within the meaning of the statute of 1573, or whether she can allege and establish a 'reasonable cause' for it, is one which cannot very conveniently be tried in this Court; indeed it was stated that most of the evidence would have to be taken by commission; and probably the only evidence that would be taken here would be that of the pursuer himself. It was argued, however, by the counsel for the pursuer, that if he should prove his possession now of a Scotch domicile, this Court has jurisdiction in the cause, by reason of the domicile of the wife following that of the husband; and if it had been clear that the matter of jurisdiction in such a case depends exclusively upon the present domicile of the husband, and that the pursuer's allegation on that subject is sufficient, the Lord Ordinary would have allowed proof of the averments bearing on that point. It is here, however, that some of the authorities to which the Lord Ordinary is about to refer raise serious difficulty.

"In the first place, assuming that the pursuer could establish that he has acquired a Scotch domicile, it appears to be doubtful whether the jurisdiction in such a cause against a wife depends entirely upon the domicile of the husband. In the case of Pitt v. Pitt, on appeal to the House of Lords (4 M'Q. 627, and 2 Macph., H. L., p. 32), the Lord Chancellor (Westbury) after stating the grounds upon which, in his judgment, a Scotch domicile had not been established, added, — 'If it had been necessary, which I trust it will not be, to arrive at a different conclusion as to the fact of his (the husband's) domicile, I should still have had the greatest possible difficulty in holding that the domicile of the husband was,

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

A proof was accordingly led before the Lord Ordinary on 3d June 1881, when, in regard to domicile, the pursuer deponed, inter alia,—"In in a case of this kind, to be regarded in law as the domicile of the wife, by construction or by attraction, so as to compel the wife to follow the husband, and to become subject, for the purpose of divorce, to the jurisdiction of the tribunal of any country in which the husband might choose, even for that purpose alone, to fix, and to declare that he intended to acquire an absolute domicile.' The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the difficulty here pointed out is one which has been recognised in the law of Scotland, and which affects in a very special manner divorce on the ground of desertion, as against a wife who has never been in Scotland, and whose non-adherence has taken place in a foreign country to which the married pair have always hitherto belonged. In the case of Ringer v. Churchill (2 D. 307), Lord Moncreiff explained very fully (foot of p. 325) the necessity of not pushing too far the presumption of the law that the wife's domicile follows that of the husband. And in the case of Jack v. Jack (Feb. 7, 1862, 24 D. 467), the opinion of the Lord President, and of Lords Ivory and Curriehill, contains the following passage (p. 471) :—"The general rule that the domicile of the wife follows that of the husband is not absolute, universal, or invariable; and it has never been applied to such a case as the present. It is truly inapplicable to such a case. The husband here did not transfer, or attempt or intend to transfer to any other country, the home or domicile of the married pair, which had been established in this country, and which, being in this country, made the Court of this country the proper forum for trying any action to be brought for dissolution of the marriage. In that respect, the condition of matters continued unaltered, with the acquiescence of both parties, until the present action was raised.' Lords Neaves and Mackenzie, in the same case, stated their opinion to be that 'no Court can entertain an action of divorce except one which has power to deal with the marriage of the parties, and to affect the status of both of them as persons subject to its jurisdiction;' and in that view, dealing with a case in which the wife remained in Scotland, and the pursuer was in America, admittedly animo remanendi, they thought it doubtful if the wife 'could be subjected to the jurisdiction of another country where she has never resided, and in which the marriage can never be said to have subsisted.' In the earlier case of Shields v. Shields (15 D. 142) the same view was expressed by the Lord Justice-Clerk, and the other Judges concurred with him. That was a case similar to Jack v. Jack. The husband, pursuer, was alleged to have acquired a domicile in America, and his wife, who had been left in Scotland, pleaded that as her domicile followed his, the Scotch Courts had no jurisdiction. The Lord Justice-Clerk said,—"This plea rests entirely on the ground assumed, viz, that the domicile of the husband not only is in all circumstances to be that in which it is competent for the husband to cite the wife, but the only forum in which she is called upon to answer to a suit at the instance of the husband. I think these are not conclusive propositions. The ground adopted by the defender seems to arise from a misconception of the case of Warrender, and an unwarranted application of some expressions in the opinions stated in that case. The case lays down, no doubt, the general proposition that the proper domicile of the husband is the domicile of the wife, and that though she has left him, and is living abroad, he shall not be deprived thereby of the remedies against her competent to him by the laws of his own country. But that proposition was stated in reference to a case in which the husband continued in the original domicile of the spouses as married parties, and by the law of which country the wife's provisions, in case of his death, were secured. The proposition was not laid down in an abstract manner, to the effect, or with the intention of establishing that in all circumstances, and whenever a husband chooses to leave his wife behind him in their native country, and to remove to different parts of the world, that the wife is bound to follow him, and meet in that country in which he finds it most easy to obtain a divorce, or that such foreign country is the only forum in which it is competent for him to proceed against her; and accordingly, when the case of Warrender was quoted in one of the the autumn of 1877 I sold my business as a law bookseller in Toronto to Messrs Frankish, Collins, & Poole, retaining an interest myself in it. I

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.

Carswell v. Carswell.

former cases to establish such a proposition Lord Mackenzie at once corrected the error, and said he drew no such consequence from it.

"In short, according to the views expressed in these cases, the domicile of the husband cannot be said to be the domicile of the wife, to the effect of founding jurisdiction in an action of divorce against her, unless the place where that constructive domicile is situate is, in the words of Lord Mackenzie in the case of Ringer v. Churchill, 'the place where the wife may reasonably be held bound to be present, and to answer to all actions against her.'"

"If any effect is to be given to these views, and if the difficulty stated by Lord Westbury in the case of Pitt v. Pitt has any foundation in law, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the present action cannot be sustained. He thinks it impossible to hold, upon the allegations in this summons, that Scotland is the place where the pursuer's wife may reasonably be expected to be present and to answer to an action at the pursuer's instance, and more especially to an action of divorce on the general ground of desertion under the statute of 1573. For although such an action now proceeds without any previous process of adherence (that process being dispensed with by the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861), the first point to be established is the breach of the obligation to adhere. In such a case the question is, as stated by Lord Fullerton in Gordon v. Gordon (9 D. 1293), 'Is this a Scotch desertion, or not?' In this case, not only has the defender never been in Scotland, but the pursuer himself has been here for little more than a year. His wife remains abroad, where she had been living separate from him for many years. She knows nothing of his removal to Scotland, or of his arrangements for that purpose. In such a case the difficulty of sustaining the constructive domicile as sufficient to found jurisdiction ratione domicilii appears very clearly, and if the circumstances of the case of Pitt v. Pitt suggested the point, the Lord Ordinary thinks it worthy of consideration here before the forum is sustained.

"The Lord Ordinary was referred to the case of Warrender, 2 Sh. and M'L. 154, and to the opinion of Lord Penzance in the case of Wilson v. Wilson (2 L. R. Probate and Div. Cases, p. 435), as contrasted with the judgment of the Court of Session in a case between the same parties reported in Macpherson's Reports, vol. x., p. 573. It was contended that these authorities prove that the present domicile of the husband is the only question in all cases. The authorities already mentioned seem to establish that the case of Warrender does not support this contention, and it is indeed difficult to apply to a case like the present the observations made in a case where Scotland was the actual domicile of the wife. For Lady Warrender had married into Scotland. Her husband was throughout the married life of the parties a domiciled Scotchman. Her residence in England was under a revocable contract of separation. In the present case the home of the parties is in Canada, and although it is alleged by the pursuer that he has acquired recently a Scotch domicile, he does not say that his wife is aware of his removal to Scotland. Her refusal to live with him when his home was in Canada seems to have been acquiesced in, and the letter written by him since he came to Scotland has not been delivered.

"With regard to the judgment of Lord Penzance in the case of Wilson, the Lord Ordinary of course recognises it as of high authority in the law of England. But there is nothing in it which can justify him in declining to recognise as of higher authority in Scotland the judgment of Lord Ormisdale, unanimously affirmed by the Judges of the First Division of the Court. Nor can he hold that the rule stated by Lord Penzance in that case, assuming it to have been correctly applied to the circumstances of Mr and Mrs Wilson, is at all applicable to the case presented by the present pursuer. The statement of Lord Penzance was as follows:—'The only fair and satisfactory rule is to insist upon the parties in all cases referring their matrimonial differences to the Courts of the country in which they are domiciled. Different communities have different views and laws respecting matrimonial obligations, and a different estimate of the causes

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

sold everything I had of a moveable character in Toronto. In February 1879 I brought my eldest daughter to Scotland, and subsequently my two younger children. They are getting their education here. I have no near relatives in Canada, except a married sister at St Louis. I have commenced business as a law bookseller in St Giles Street, Edinburgh. I have taken a lease of the premises for five years. I have stocked the shop, and have purchased the law department of the business of James Stillie. My business has been profitable so far. There is a congregation of the New Jerusalem Church in Edinburgh, and I have joined it. One main reason of my leaving Toronto was my desire to obtain a divorce. I found I could not obtain a divorce in Canada. I read up the law of Scotland and the laws of different States in the United States. I found I could have got a divorce in the States, but I should have had to become a citizen of the States, and I wished to retain my nationality. I have also a liking to Scotland and to Scotland's laws, and my idea is that they are what they ought to be. It is my present intention to remain in Scotland as my home. My intention is not to return to Canada. I have reasons for not returning there. I have abandoned Canada as my home."

which should justify divorce. It is both just and reasonable, therefore, that the differences of married people should be adjusted in accordance with the laws of the community to which they belong, and dealt with by the tribunals which alone can administer these laws.' The rule so stated does not differ substantially from the rule applied in Shields v. Shields, and Jack v. Jack. It assumes that both parties have an actual domicile in one country, and that both are de facto members of the community to the tribunals of which an appeal is made. In the present case the defender is not a member of that community. She has never de facto belonged to Scotland, or been subject to the laws of Scotland. If she has a domicile here by reason of her husband having come here in 1879 it is a mere legal fiction, and not at all the kind of domicile which Lady Warrender had. Actual jurisdiction over her person this Court has none, and if it could affect her status by giving decree of divorce in terms of the conclusions of the present summons the exercise of such a power at the instance of the pursuer, and in the circumstances stated, would be altogether without example in the law of Scotland.

"This leads the Lord Ordinary to notice, in the second place, another difficulty in the way of sustaining the present action. The allegations disclose no case of Scotch desertion. Divorce for desertion is in Scotland founded on statute. The statute is applicable to Scotch spouses. It used to be thought that the only persons who could be sued in the process of adherence 'are such as continue within the kingdom'—Ersk. I. 6, 44. The statute has not been so read, however, in practice, as to exclude altogether action against a Scotch husband or wife going out of the country, and deserting his or her home. But it has not been in use to be applied where there was nothing of the nature of desertion by a Scotch husband or wife from a Scottish home. (See the cases of Black v. Anderson, 4 D. 615; A B v. C D, 7 D. 556; Gordon v. Gordon, D. 1293; O'Rourke, 11 D. 976; Hume v. Hume, 24 D. 1342). The opinion of Mr Fraser (II. Husband and Wife, 1332) does not appear to be supported by any decision. It is true that in divorce for adultery the locus delicti is held to be immaterial, but no divorce for desertion can take place in Scotland without constituting in some form the obligation to adhere in this country, and establishing with reference to that obligation the 'malicious and obstinate defection' required by the statute. In the present case there is nothing to show that the defender could have been compelled to adhere in Canada during the period when the pursuer was admittedly a domiciled Canadian; and as the pursuer has been in Scotland only for a year, and apparently without his wife's knowledge, the Lord Ordinary has difficulty in finding the allegations relevant."

On 8th June 1881 the Lord Ordinary reported the proof to the Second No. 162. Division.*

The pursuer argued ;—The pursuer had come to Scotland with a settled purpose of taking up his residence there. There was nothing to suggest anything to the contrary. Assuming that to be the case, then he was a domiciled Scotchman, and was entitled to the benefit of the laws of Scotland. That being so, the wife's domicile must be held to follow the husband's, and a divorce on the ground of desertion was competent. The dictum of Lord Chancellor Westbury in Pitt v. Pitt,¹ cited by the Lord Ordinary, was

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

* "NOTE.—In case it should be desired by the Court, the Lord Ordinary thinks it right to report his opinion upon the evidence. The only witness examined before him (with the exception of the agent, who was called to prove certain documents) was the pursuer himself. He gave his evidence with candour, and impressed the Lord Ordinary favourably as a reliable witness. But the result of the evidence as a whole is, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, that the pursuer has failed to establish facts and circumstances sufficient to authorise the Courts of Scotland to adjudge the absent defender guilty of malicious and obstinate desertion, and to pronounce decree of divorce between the spouses.

"The primary defect in the evidence which the Lord Ordinary observes is, that the domicile which the pursuer has set up in Scotland since 1879 is not established as in any real sense the domicile of the defender. It was not acquired as a domicile for her but as a domicile against her, and in order to enable the pursuer to obtain a divorce. The pursuer's evidence is quite frank on this point. 'One main reason of my leaving Toronto,' he says, 'was my desire to obtain a divorce.'

"But it farther appears that any domicile which the pursuer has established in Scotland has been acquired without his wife's knowledge; and although it may be the pursuer's misfortune more than his fault, it is nevertheless the fact that, so far as appears, the defender has never yet received notice of his change of home, or of his desire to have her society in this country. No steps appear to have been taken by the pursuer between 1873 and 1879 for the purpose of enforcing his conjugal rights in Canada; and the evidence does not shew that anything which can be held equivalent to a demand for adherence in Scotland has been notified to the defender. The letter of 5th December 1879 appears never to have been delivered; and although the reason of this may be that she cannot now be found, the Lord Ordinary is not satisfied that he can apply to such a defender the provisions of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, to the effect of holding her duly cited. She has never been in Scotland, and is not in any way subject to the law of Scotland, unless the pursuer's domicile can, by construction of law, be held to be her domicile. This, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, cannot be held in the present case. For further explanation of the view upon which he has arrived at this conclusion the Lord Ordinary refers to the note to his interlocutor of November 1st, 1880.

"On the merits,—if the Lord Ordinary were called upon to deal with them, he would say that the cause of separation between the spouses is proved to have been incompatibility of temper, and disagreement on matters of opinion. This, in law, is no sufficient cause for remaining separate, and would afford the wife no defence in an action of adherence. But it rather appears from the evidence that although the pursuer sent certain messages to his wife he practically acquiesced, at least down to 1879, in her remaining separate. Prior to 5th December 1879 he had given her no intimation of the kind contained in the letter of that date, and that letter unfortunately is not proved to have been delivered. On the whole, the Lord Ordinary could not affirm, on the evidence before him, that the defender has been for four years in 'malicious and obstinate defection.'"

¹ Pitt v. Pitt, April 6, 1864, 4 M'Q. 627, 2 Macph., H. L. 28; Ringer v. Churchill, January 15, 1840, 2 D. 307; Jack v. Jack, February 7, 1862, 24 D. 467, 34 Scot. Jur. 234; Warrender v. Warrender, August 27, 1835, 2 Sh.

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

obiter to the case, and was not adopted by the other Judges. If the pursuer had died, the Scotch law would have regulated his succession.¹ In England the actual domicile of the husband at the date of the raising of the action settles the question of the jurisdiction of the Courts.² The domicile here was bona fide, though it was acquired partly for the purpose of getting the divorce.

(The Court did not call on counsel for the pursuer to complete his argument.³)

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case some very important questions are raised by the Lord Ordinary in the note to his report.

The action is an action of divorce at the instance of Robert Carswell, who says he is domiciled in Scotland—describing himself as a law bookseller, residing at Warrender Park Road, Edinburgh,—against his wife, whom he married in Toronto, and who, he says, has deserted him since 1873. There seems no doubt whatever that his wife did desert him in that year. The Lord Ordinary expresses a doubt on the proof of this matter. He seems to doubt whether the evidence establishes that the wife has been guilty of malicious and obstinate desertion. That is certainly an element in the case, and I must say that so far as it is concerned I never saw a case in which malicious and obstinate desertion was more clearly proved in the sense of a resolute determination of the wife not to return to cohabitation with her husband. I fancy that is a state of matters which truly fulfils the entire and most absolute meaning of the words “malicious and obstinate desertion.” No doubt it is necessary that a wife should be asked to return to her husband, or that her husband should not shew any disinclination to receive her, should she manifest a desire to return, but I can find nothing in the evidence to indicate any disinclination on the part of the pursuer to receive the defender; still less is there any proof of a refusal on his part. And if the case had rested there I should have been of opinion that in the conduct of this wife the words of the old Scottish statute had been fulfilled. She has gone away from him, separated herself from him, hid herself from him, expressed her determination over and over again not to live with him, and, as far as the evidence leads us to an opinion on the point, there is no palliation of her conduct, or excuse for it. There is nothing in the pursuer’s treatment of his wife—and only one or two instances of his conduct are alleged—which can for a moment justify the absence of the defender from her husband.

But the other question raised by the Lord Ordinary is surrounded with difficulty; and while I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to prevail in this action, I must own it is not without very considerable difficulty.

It is quite true that the domicile of the wife follows that of the husband.

and M’L. 154; Wilson v. Wilson, March 8, 1872, 10 Macph. 573, 44 Scot. Jur. 295.

¹ Hog v. Lashley, July 12, 1804, 4 Pat. App. 581; Hall’s Trustees v. Hall, July 13, 1854, 16 D. 1057, 26 Scot. Jur. 570.

² Wilson v. Wilson, March 14, 1872, 2 L. R. Prob. and Div. Cases, 435.

³ Other Authorities.—Harvey v. Farnie, April 22, 1880, 5 L. R. Prob. Div. 153; Briggs v. Briggs, May 11, 1880, 5 L. R. Prob. Div. 163; Lauder v. Van Ghent, 1692, Ferguson’s Div. Rep. 250; Muir v. Muir, July 19, 1879, ante, vol. vi. 1353; Udny v. Udny, December 14, 1866, 5 Macph. 164, 39 Scot. Jur. 163, June 3, 1869, 7 Macph., H. L. 89; Bell v. Kennedy, May 14, 1868, 6 Macph. H. L. 69.

It is also quite true that the husband here has done all that he could to acquire a domicile of this kind—that is to say, all that he could, if he could shake himself free of the circumstances under which he first came into this country. But that is a difficult matter. He was a domiciled Canadian. The domicile of the marriage was Canadian. The wife when he left her or when she left him was a Canadian. He has never been able to communicate with her, for he does not know where she is. Consequently, if we have jurisdiction to pronounce this decree it is because the wife's domicile follows that of the husband.

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.

Carswell v.
Carswell.

Now, the authorities quoted to us at the debate certainly prove this, that in such a matter as that of divorce it is not in every case or to every effect that the wife's domicile follows that of the husband. If the wife were here resisting the action—if she were here complaining that Toronto was her domicile, and that she was compelled to assume a new domicile because her husband had gone away to Scotland, and in that way had obliged her to follow him to a foreign country and a foreign Court—foreign so far as she is concerned—and a country not the country of her marriage, grave difficulties might present themselves; there might be a hardship and a want of expediency also, perhaps a want of principle, in following the course which now suggests itself to us.

But I want to save my opinion on that matter. I am of opinion that it is not in every case that we should hold that the wife's domicile follows that of her husband.

On the other hand, I am of opinion that the husband has done all he could in the present case to acquire a new domicile for himself in Scotland. He has set himself up in business, he has acquired property, he has made provision for the future, he has done everything that a man honestly could do who had the intention of remaining here for the future. He has been here two or three years. There is, it is true, another consideration to be taken into view. The origin of his Scottish domicile, supposing him to have acquired it, was under peculiar circumstances. That origin, beyond all question, was the pressure of an immediate object, and that object was the obtaining of a divorce from the laws of this country which the laws of his own domicile would not afford him. It is impossible to tell for how long it is his intention to remain here. We have to take his own statement of that. It is impossible in the meantime to say whether it will turn out in the end that the man was or was not domiciled in this country in the sense that he had an animus remanendi apart altogether from the question of his obtaining a divorce.

While I have thus stated the difficulties which have presented themselves to my mind, and presented themselves, I may say, very strongly, I am not prepared to refuse the remedy which the pursuer seeks. I think the desertion has been entirely causeless, malicious, and obstinate. The defender has also debarred herself from making any reply to the accusations of the pursuer. She does not wish to reply to them, and, so far as I can see, she could make no good answer to the charge of wilful and malicious and obstinate desertion. For my own part, therefore, and taking and weighing all those difficulties that occur on both sides, I think we shall do more justice, and not infringe on the abstract principle of law, in giving the pursuer the remedy he seeks.

Lord Young.—I am of the same opinion. Of course we can only consider the fact of desertion on the assumption that the pursuer is a domiciled Scotshman. Agreeing with your Lordship that we can effectually consider the question,

No. 162. I concur with what your Lordship has said as to the result. I think the wife is proved to be in malicious—in the proper sense of that term—and obstinately continued desertion of her husband.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

Passing now to the interesting question which your Lordship has touched upon, whether or not the pursuer is really a domiciled Scotchman, I think that is mainly a question of fact, for the legal subtleties upon the subject are much more perplexing than useful. To begin with, the pursuer is no foreigner in the sense of being an alien. He is a born subject of the Queen (if that makes any difference, which I think it does not—at least no material difference). His home, and therefore his domicile, which simply means home, was in Canada. He married there, and both he and his wife were entitled to look to the Canadian law as governing the relations between them as husband and wife; and it is our duty, without any doubt, to see that no fraud is practised upon that law, or upon the rights of the wife to have her position as a wife determined by it. I need not say that in the decision we are to pronounce we shall be on our guard against that.

However that may be, every Canadian—indeed every free and intelligent human being—is, according to the views of the law of Scotland, at liberty to change his domicile. He may leave the country where he was born, where his domicile and his home have been since his birth, and he may adopt another country and make it his home. That is always in his power, if, as I say, he is a free man, and intelligent enough to be left at liberty to use his freedom. That is his right. Now, the question of fact is, Has the pursuer exercised that undoubted right of his, or not? Any Canadian is at perfect liberty, being free and intelligent, to come to Scotland, and adopt it as his home—making it his domicile, which he does by making it his home. Of course no man acts at all, certainly not in so serious a matter, without a motive. The motive which has influenced anybody's actions is very important to consider in determining the question of fact whether a man has really adopted another country, and made it the country of his domicile or home. But the moment the fact is determined that he has changed his domicile, his having had the former domicile ceases to be material. If I could think the pursuer was making a mere pretence in having adopted Scotland as his home, that he had come here merely as a visitor in order to invoke the Scotch law against his wife, and that having achieved that end he intended to return to the country which, ex hypothesi, had never ceased to be his home, I should not entertain his action for a moment. But I am satisfied upon the evidence here that the pursuer, in the exercise of his undoubted liberty and legal right, has adopted Scotland and made it his home, and that there is no fraud in the matter at all. And I think so none the less that I think it is extremely likely—indeed I should think it quite certain—that if his wife had made his home a happy one in Canada he never would have left it. We may even consider it quite certain that he has made Scotland his home because he prefers the law which in that view would govern his domestic relations, and enable him to be free of the woman who has maliciously and perseveringly deserted him, and who, according to the evidence before us, evidently had the intention of taking up with anybody she met with and thought a nice person to live with.

Now, if he took advice, as I think as a prudent man he probably did, he would be advised in this way—"If you adopt Scotland as your country, and make it your home really, and your new domicile, in that case, it being your new domicile, it will be your wife's also." For I think that is a universally accepted principle, that when a free man, being married, changes his domicile, at all events to Scotland, he changes it not only for himself but for his wife. There is a good deal of talk of fictitious domiciles, about a man having been long enough in a country to acquire a domicile of citation, and so on. I do not think that has anything to do with the matter. Certainly a man may come here and subject himself to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country and be cited in it, having what is called a domicile of citation, without that having the slightest effect upon the domicile of his wife. But if he comes here and makes Scotland his home—comes animo remanendi—then the domicile is changed not only for him but for his wife. And I know of no exception to that proposition. For it is not the case of a substitution of one country for another for himself alone. His household are subject to the change. It is his home that he changes, and his wife must change with him.

The Lord Ordinary says here that the pursuer has acquired his domicile in Scotland without his wife's knowledge. How is that? Simply because she has deserted him. It is very questionable, I think, if she is ignorant of his whereabouts. But whether she is or not, it is because she is not doing her duty. According to the law of the pursuer's domicile, or, I suppose, to any law whatever, she remains in ignorance because of a breach of her duty, and it is for that same breach of duty that the law affords the remedy. Her duty as a wife is to be with her husband here, and I cannot accept the language of the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer's domicile in Scotland was acquired as a domicile not for her, but as a domicile against her. It is a domicile for her, assuming that he has made Scotland his home. And I have arrived at the conclusion that he has done so without any difficulty. I think he has made it his domicile from no unworthy motive, although I cannot enter into motive at all, being satisfied of the fact, and motive being material only where inquiry is necessary to ascertain whether the fact be so or not. The pursuer, I repeat, has made this country his domicile, and it is the domicile of his wife. I cannot say, in such a state of the facts, that the law of Scotland is an unfair law to govern the domestic relations of a man who has adopted this country as his home. The duty of his wife is to be here, and subject to the same law as her husband. If he had deserted her she might have appealed to our law for the remedy which our law affords. Our law governs equally, and I assume justly and equitably, the rights and interests of both parties. Now, it is because she has gone away from him that she does not know he is here, and is not here with him—if indeed she is ignorant, which I have already said I consider extremely doubtful—for although she is keeping herself concealed from him, he has not done anything to keep his movements concealed from her. Therefore I entirely agree with your Lordship, and I confess that my mind is not disturbed by any difficulties as to the conclusion we should reach either in point of fact or in point of law. I think, as matter of law and justice, the pursuer is entitled to appeal, as he has done, and upon the evidence to appeal with success.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This case, which comes before us on the report of the Lord Ordinary, is an undefended action of divorce at the instance of Mr Carswell, formerly of Toronto, who is in business as a bookseller in Edinburgh, against his wife, who is not now and never has been in Scotland. Three questions are presented for decision,—First, Our jurisdiction to grant divorce. Second,

No. 162. Whether ground for divorce has been established. And third, Whether service of the summons edictally ought, in the circumstances, to be sustained as sufficient execution of the summons.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

The last arises only because Mrs Carswell, the defender, has not appeared in the suit, for her appearance would have obviated any objection that could have been stated to the sufficiency of the citation. Even, however, though the defender has not appeared, and it is possible, though highly improbable, that the institution of this action has not come to her knowledge, nothing more can be done to give her intimation, as the place where she is cannot be discovered. The action therefore may be allowed to proceed.

The 10th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict., c. 86), leaves the course to be followed to the discretion of the Court. An opposite determination on this point would be a suspension of all procedure in the present action, which of itself is a consideration appearing to me conclusive of the way in which this point ought to be decided.

Passing now to the other questions, the first thing which is to be kept in view is that the non-appearance of the defender in no degree diminishes the responsibility of the Court in the administration of the laws of this country. On the contrary, it increases the anxiety which we must feel in deciding, if it does not also increase the difficulty in decision. Had the defender appeared here, her counsel would have assisted in the argument, but as she is absent, we must, as best we can, make up for the want of the aid which the Court receives when both parties in a suit are represented in the argument upon the points raised for judgment.

This being an action of divorce, and so including other than mere patrimonial interests, the Court is bound to see that both parties are, as in a question relative to their status as married persons, subject to its jurisdiction. The pursuer says he is, because he is domiciled in this country—that is, has his true domicile, or domicile of succession, in this country, and, as a consequence, his wife, the defender, must be amenable to our jurisdiction, her domicile being the domicile of her husband, the pursuer. Taking these points in their order, has the pursuer shewn by the evidence adduced that his domicile is now in Scotland? He is a Canadian by birth, and he married in Canada. His only business connection until 1879 was there. But he then left Canada, and since 1879 he has been in Edinburgh, where he has established a business. These things are perfectly compatible with the idea that his Canadian domicile is unchanged. But they all are material—one of them indeed is all-important. The pursuer is now in this country, and hence one of two elements essential to the constitution of domicile, namely, personal presence, has been secured. What, then, is required for the constitution of domicile? On this subject the statement of the law given by Lord Chancellor Westbury in Udny v. Udny (L. R., 1 Sc. App. 458) has, I think, been generally received, namely, that “domicile of choice is a conclusion or inference which the law derives from the fact of a man fixing voluntarily his sole or chief residence in a particular place, with an intention of continuing to reside there for an unlimited time.” This is a description of the circumstances which create or constitute a domicile, and not a definition of the term. There must be a residence freely chosen, and not prescribed or dictated by any external necessity, such as the duties of office, the demands of creditors, or the relief from illness; and it must be residence fixed not for a limited period or particular purpose, but general and indefinite in its future contemplation. It is true that residence originally temporary or intended for a limited period may afterwards become general and unlimited, and in such a case, so soon as the change of purpose, or animus remanendi, can be inferred, the fact of domicile is established." No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v. Carswell.

What, therefore, is to be decided is, Whether there is proof of a purpose to change the original domicile? The answer to this question depends on the credit to be given to the testimony of the pursuer. The shortness of the period during which he has been in Scotland necessarily must be taken into account, but as to this it may be well to bring into view a passage from the opinion of Lord Westbury in the case of Bell v. Kennedy. He there says (L. R. 1 Sc. App. 320, 6 Macph. H. L. 69):—"Residence and domicile are two perfectly distinct things. It is necessary in the administration of the law that the idea of domicile should exist, and that the fact of domicile should be ascertained, in order to determine which of two municipal laws may be invoked for the purpose of regulating the rights of parties. We know very well that succession and distribution depend upon the law of domicile. Domicile, therefore, is an idea of law; it is the relation which the law creates between an individual and a particular locality or country. To every adult person the law ascribes a domicile, and that domicile remains his fixed attribute until a new and different attribute usurps its place. Now, this case was argued at the bar on the footing that as soon as Mr Bell left Jamaica he had a settled and fixed intention of taking up his residence in Scotland. And if, indeed, that had been ascertained as a fact, then you would have had the animus of the party clearly demonstrated, and the factum, which alone would remain to be proved, would in fact be proved, or at least would result immediately upon his arrival in Scotland." This I take to be an accurate statement of the law, and consequently the shortness of the time during which the pursuer has been in this country does not preclude the idea that his domicile is now in this country. The pursuer says that he has come for an indefinite period, that he has not come for any temporary purpose, and that he has no intention of leaving at any period which for the present is in contemplation. If he is to be taken as speaking the truth, then there is not only the fact of his presence here, but the intention to abandon his Canadian domicile, and to acquire a domicile in this country. And these are the two elements, and the only two elements, which are required. I see no reason why the pursuer is to be discredited, and I credit his testimony. I think that the facts necessary for the constitution of domicile have been established. In so dealing with the case I am materially influenced by the views of the law which were explained in the judgment which was pronounced by Lord Penzance in the case of Wilson v. Wilson, March 14, 1872, L. R. 2 Prob. and Div. 435. He there rested his decision on the answer to the issue, Was the pursuer to be credited or not? And having given credit to the pursuer, he held that the grounds for jurisdiction had been established. The other facts in that case, it may be added, were of course consistent with but were no more suggestive of a change of domicile than those which are before the Court. Assuming that the pursuer has his true domicile in this country, it is next to be considered whether the defender, his wife, is also domiciled in Scotland. This appears to me to be a plain, not to say necessary, result. Lord Penzance so held in the case referred to, and (though I leave open for consideration the amenability of a wife to the Courts of this country if

No. 162.

July 6, 1881.
Carswell v.
Carswell.

a more limited domicile than the true domicile is that upon which the husband sues) I give it as my opinion that in a case where the husband's true domicile is the source of jurisdiction that must be held to be the domicile of the wife. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Court have jurisdiction.

And in regard to the credibility of the pursuer in making the statements he has made about his change of domicile, I only desire to add this, that the case appears to me to be as strong as the case of Wilson v. Wilson which I have already referred to, and in which the jurisdiction as regards the pursuer was sustained by Lord Penzance. The pursuer here has come to this country, and has established himself in business in this country. All that he has done since he came to this country is consistent with the facts as he alleges them. There being nothing to throw discredit on that testimony, we are not entitled—nothing calls upon us—to criticise it as at all doubtful. We must take the fact from him that he has come here making this country his home, and because it is his home his domicile is now in this country. If his domicile is in this country I concur with my brother Lord Young, and with your Lordship, in thinking that the domicile of the wife is in this country also. The domicile now acquired by him is acquired not for himself alone but also for his wife. Hence, as regards both pursuer and defender—for we must have jurisdiction over both before we can give the remedy which is asked—they are, in my opinion, subject to jurisdiction in this country, because they are domiciled in Scotland.

There being no doubt in my mind that the defender wilfully and maliciously deserted the pursuer, according to the ordinary administration of the law in such cases the pursuer is entitled to have decree of divorce as concluded for.

On the question whether the desertion has been established, I think that the facts proved in evidence established the desertion, and consequently, there being jurisdiction, decree of divorce ought to be pronounced.

THE COURT granted decree as craved.

PRINGLE & DALLAS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 163.

FREDERICK PITMAN AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—J. P. B. Robertson—Graham Murray.

July 7, 1881.
Pitman, &c. v.
Burnett's
Trustees.

THE REVEREND DANIEL FOX SANDFORD AND ANOTHER (Burnett's Trustees), Respondents.—Johnstone—Young.

Burgh—Jurisdiction of Dean of Guild Court—Competition of heritable rights—Title must be ex facie apparent.—A party pleading want of jurisdiction in the Dean of Guild Court, on the ground that the question raised is one of right to heritable property, must set forth upon record an ex facie good title to the subjects.

1ST DIVISION.
Dean of Guild
Court, Edinburgh.
C.

THE petitioners were in right of certain subjects upon which were built the three houses Nos. 112, 113, and 114 Princes Street, Edinburgh, and the respondents were in right of certain other subjects upon which were built Nos. 115, 116, and 117, being, with that part of No. 1 Castle Street which fronted Princes Street, also belonging to the respondents, the whole property in Princes Street between the house No. 114 and Castle Street.

Both sets of subjects were originally feued from the town by a Mr No. 163. Robert Burn, who conveyed them in 1787 and 1794 respectively to the authors of the two parties. The petitioners' subjects were "bounded on the west by the centre of a mutual gavel built between the ground hereby and that other part of the ground feued to the said Robert Burn, . . . on the south by Princes Street, and on the north by the meuse lane." July 7, 1881.
Pitman, &c. v.
Burnett's
Trustees.

The petitioners proposed to take down their houses and to erect new buildings to be used as a club-house for the Scottish Conservative Club, and this was an application to the Dean of Guild for warrant to do so. It was opposed by the respondents upon different grounds, inter alia, upon the following:—At the back of the said houses, and on the other side of the mutual gable which formed the western boundary of the petitioners' property, a passage or lane ran north to Rose Street Lane, and was used as a back entrance to some of the respondents' houses. The operations of the petitioners were calculated to affect this lane. The plans shewed that the operations included the formation of gratings on the solum of the lane for the purpose of giving light to an under floor of the buildings, and it also appeared that the scarcement was to extend some feet below the ground of the lane. To this the respondents objected.

Both parties claimed the right of property in the said lane, but neither set forth a good title to it upon record. The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—4. The questions raised in this process, including particularly those as to the said private lane, the property in part of the ground immediately to the north of 114 Princes Street, now claimed by the petitioners, but belonging to the respondents, Burnett's Trustees, and the necessity of leaving space for light and air to the other subjects flowing from the common author, Robert Burn, being questions of heritable right, are not competent for decision in the Dean of Guild Court, and the petition accordingly falls to be dismissed.

The Dean of Guild, upon 16th June 1881, pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds that the petitioners and respondents respectively claim the exclusive right of property in the said lane by virtue of their titles, and the respondents further allege that it has been in their exclusive possession from time immemorial as a part and pertinent of their properties: Finds that a question of heritable right is thus raised between the parties, which cannot be competently decided in this Court: Sits process hoc statu that the petitioners may, if so advised, raise a declarator to establish their right to the said lane as proposed to be used by them."

The petitioners appealed, and argued;—It was not enough for the respondents to set forth a vague claim of property. Their titles did not bear the construction they sought to place upon them. The fact was that neither party had any right to the solum of the lane. The lane was the boundary in each case. The right was one of common interest, which did not exclude the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild.¹

The respondents argued that if they had no right of property, which was not clear upon their titles, they at least had a common interest in the solum of the lane, and had been in the exclusive possession of it. That was a heritable right, and assuming that they could plead the case no higher, that was sufficient to exclude the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction.²

¹ Johnstone v. White, May 18, 1877, ante, vol. iv., p. 721.

² Anderson v. Dalrymple, June 20, 1799, M. 12831.

No. 163.

July 7, 1881.
Pitman, &c. v.
Burnett's
Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When it is said that a question of heritable right cannot competently be tried in the Dean of Guild Court that does not by any means imply that no kind of question relating to heritage can be raised and decided in that Court, but if the question raised amounts to a distinct competition of title, then the titles must be cleared by a declarator in this Court. Now, what is the question here? Both the petitioners and the respondents aver, in general terms, that they are proprietors of this lane, and the question is, Whether there is a relevant averment to that effect on the one side or the other? I am of opinion that there is no relevant averment of property either by the petitioners or by the respondents. And when I say this, I mean that in order to a relevant averment of right of property, so as to raise a competition of title, it is essential that the averment should set forth a good title to the subjects ex facie of the record; and it appears to me that the title set forth in the record by the petitioners and the respondents respectively demonstrates that neither the one nor the other of them have any right in the solum of the lane. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Court should repel the fourth plea in law for the respondents, and remit to the Dean of Guild to proceed further with the case.

LORD DEAS.—If the state of the competition of titles had been as described in the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild there cannot be the least doubt of the correctness of his judgment. But that is not the true state of matters. So far from both parties claiming an exclusive right of property in the lane, it now appears that neither of them claims the sole right. There is nothing now claimed in regard to the lane except a right of passage. That is, no doubt, in one sense, a heritable right, but it is not a kind of heritable right from which the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild is excluded. If his jurisdiction were excluded from that kind of heritable right then it would be excluded in a large class of cases very fit for his very useful jurisdiction. The respondents' counsel has referred to a clause in the title of one of the respondents, in which it is stated that certain subjects are conveyed "together with an entry or passage from the said dwelling-house, three feet three inches in breadth, into the meuse lane behind," but that on the very face of it is not a right of property at all. An entry or passage into a meuse lane or any other place may be a heritable right of passage, but it is not a heritable right of property. Both parties now confess that neither the one nor the other has a title to the property of this lane, and therefore I am most clearly of opinion that neither the one nor the other can interfere with the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild in this matter, and that the only course open to the Court is to remit the case back to the Dean of Guild to be proceeded with.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Dean of Guild's interlocutor, repelled the fourth plea in law for the respondents, and remitted to the Dean of Guild to proceed with the case.

SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—JAMES M'CAUL, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN BROWNLIE AND OTHERS (Liquidators of the "Scottish Savings and Investment Building Society"), Appellants.—Guthrie Smith— No. 164.
J. A. Reid.

JAMES RUSSELL, Respondent.—H. J. Moncreiff—Strachan.

July 7, 1881.
 Liquidators of
 the Scottish
 Savings and Investment
 Building
 Society v.
 Russell.

Friendly Society—Building Society—Effect of winding-up order on position of members—Right of member to pay up loan and withdraw under rules—Stat. 37 and 38 Vict., cap. 42 (Building Societies Act, 1874), sec. 14.—Held that a member of a building society, who under its rules was entitled to withdraw from it on payment of the balance of a loan due by him to the society, was not deprived of this right by the society having gone into voluntary liquidation at a time when it was due no debts except to its own members.

THE "Scottish Savings and Investment Building Society" was established in 1856 under the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV., cap. 32. The objects of the society were stated in the first rule to be—"1st, To provide a mode of investing the savings of its members securely and profitably; 2d, to advance funds on heritable security, and to enable its members to erect or purchase houses or other heritable property in terms of the statute 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 32, and the following rules."

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
 M.

By rule 2 each share was fixed to be of the value of £25, but members might hold any number of shares that might be agreed upon.

Rule 5 provided for the manner in which the shares were to be paid up, and was as follows:—"V. The shares shall be paid by monthly instalments of 2s., or 4s., or 6s. per share, as may be agreed upon. Members may change from one to another scale of payment at the beginning of the financial year only. The monthly instalments shall continue to be paid until (with the profit arising thereon) they amount to the full value of £25, when the members holding such paid-up shares shall be paid out of the society, in the order of the shares being realised, and as the funds of the society permit. In the event of the society not being prepared to pay out a member when his shares are realised, he shall receive interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum upon the amount of his shares, or upon the balance of the amount from the time of the shares being realised, until the member receives his full amount."

It then continued, dealing with profits, in these terms:—"The profits of the society shall be ascertained annually, and shall be declared by the manager in his statement of the accounts made to the members at their annual general meeting. And within three months after said meeting, the amount of profits accruing to each member in proportion to his capital, arising from instalments and profits, and to the time such capital has been in the society, shall be ascertained and carried to the credit of his account in the ledger, and also placed in his pass-book with the society as contingent profits, subject to the rules of this society, and to the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 32, sec. 1."

Rule 9 provided:—"IX. Transfer or withdrawal of shares.—Members who have not received an advance may at any time, provided all arrears and penalties be paid, transfer their shares, with all the privileges effeiring thereto, in the form No. III in the appendix, on payment of a transfer fee of 1s. per share to the society; or they may withdraw the whole or any portion of their shares at any time after twelve months from the date of entry, by giving one month's notice, when the whole instalments on the shares withdrawn shall be repaid, with interest, as follows:—If the shares are withdrawn during the second or third year, the instalments shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum; if during the fourth or fifth, 4½ per cent; and after that, and until the shares are

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

realised, 5 per cent. Members withdrawing shall be paid out in the order of their application, and as the funds permit, and shall be bound at settlement to deliver up their pass-books and certificates of shares."

Advances to members were dealt with in rule 10, which, after providing that advances would be made to the members offering the largest bonuses therefor, proceeded:—"No member shall have a right to have an advance allocated to him, nor shall any member be entitled to bid for the money when offered for sale, unless six months' instalments, and all other payments due on his shares, shall have been paid; nor shall he receive a larger advance than the amount of shares for which he has subscribed. . . . Every member who receives an advance shall grant a bond or other deed or deeds for the same over the heritable property offered by him in security, under which deeds the directors may exercise all the ordinary rights and powers of mortgagees."

Rule 12 was as follows:—"XII. Repayment of advances.—All advances shall be repaid by monthly instalments, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum; and which interest shall be paid monthly, in advance, and at the same time as the instalments. Any member failing to pay his instalments or interest when due shall be charged a fine of 1d. per month on every sum of 2s. he shall fail in paying. . . . It shall also be lawful at all times for a member who has obtained an advance to withdraw from the society, upon giving the manager one month's notice in writing, and paying up the whole of his debt, interests, and penalties, after deducting the amount of the monthly instalments paid upon his shares, with interest thereon, calculated at the rates referred to in rule 9."

Rule 14 bore:—" . . . All the property vested in the society in security shall be insured by the manager in name of the trustees at the expense of the borrower with such insurance company as the directors may appoint, and that to the extent of the money advanced by the society, less the amount of instalments that may be paid on the shares upon which the loan has been granted, if any so desire it, but such adjustments of the amount in policies not to made oftener than once in three years, and only if the member so desiring is not in arrears of payments."

The society was subsequently, on 26th November 1879, registered under "The Building Societies Act, 1874."*

In November 1867, James Russell, portioner, Glasgow, became a member of the society, and in May 1868 he effected a loan of £700 from the society, and in accordance with the rules had twenty-eight £25 shares in the society allotted to him. To obtain this loan he paid a bonus of £14 and certain fees prescribed by the rules. He duly granted a heritable bond for £700 over subjects belonging to him, the following relative memorandum being signed by him and by the directors of the society:—"The said James Russell having, of this date, obtained an advance of £700 from the said society as the amount of twenty-eight shares held by him therein and granted a bond, it is hereby declared that notwithstanding of said bond and disposition in security being in the usual terms as regards the date of payment of the principal sum and interest, it is nevertheless understood that the same shall not be enforced by the directors and manager of the said society as long as the said James Russell shall continue the regular payment of the instalments, interest, and other sums to become due upon his said shares in terms of the rules of the said society." No. 164.

* 37 and 38 Vict., cap. 42, sec. 14, of this Act provides:—"The liability of any member of any society under this Act, in respect of any share upon which no advance has been made, shall be limited to the amount actually paid, or in arrear on such share, and in respect of any share upon which an advance has been made, shall be limited to the amount payable thereon under any mortgage, or other security, or under the rules of the society."

 From 15th May 1868, when the advance was made him, he paid the monthly instalments and interest in accordance with the rules of the society.*

On 20th February 1880 the directors of the society applied in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire for and obtained a winding-up order from that Court. Under this order John Brownlie and others were appointed liquidators. At the date when the winding-up order was pronounced

July 7, 1881.
 Liquidators of
 the Scottish
 Savings and Investment
 Building
 Society v.
 Russell.

* (1) Excerpt from Respondent's first Pass-Book.

No. 691.

MR JAMES RUSSELL, CARVER AND GILDER, 9 SOUTH PORTLAND STREET,

IN ACCOUNT WITH THE SCOTTISH SAVINGS INVESTMENT AND
 Dr. BUILDING SOCIETY, ON 28 SHARES, Nos. 16,552-16,579. Cr.

When Due.	Instalments on Shares.	Bonus and Interest on Advance.	Entrance Fees and Fines.	TOTAL.	1868.
1867.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Nov.	2 16 0	...	1 9 0	} 4 7 4
Dec.	2 16 0	...	0 2 4
1868.			0 4 8	3 0 8
Jan.	2 16 0	...	0 7 0	3 3 0
Feb.	2 16 0	...	0 9 4	3 5 4
Mar.	2 16 0	...	0 11 8	3 7 8
April	2 16 0	2 16 0	April 3
May	2 16 0	2 16 0	May 5
June	2 16 0	2 16 0	June 2
		2 18 4	...	2 18 4	June 2
July	2 16 0	2 18 4	...	5 14 4	July 7
Aug.	2 16 0	2 18 4	...	5 14 4	Aug. 4

(3) Sheets pasted on the inside of the cover of Pass-Books.

SCOTTISH SAVINGS INVESTMENT AND BUILDING SOCIETY.
 CONTINGENT PROFIT ACCRUED ON 28 SHARES OF NOV. 1867, Nos. 16,552-16,579.

Up to 28th February, 1869,	.	.	.	£1 14 8
" " 1870,	.	.	.	3 17 9
" " 1871,	.	.	.	5 17 7
" " 1872,	.	.	.	7 13 5
" " 1873,	.	.	.	10 11 10
" " 1874,	.	.	.	14 2 2
" " 1875,	.	.	.	15 19 0
" " 1876,	.	.	.	19 10 3
" " 1877,	.	.	.	22 14 5
" " 1878,	.	.	.	21 12 5

SCOTTISH SAVINGS INVESTMENT AND BUILDING SOCIETY.
 CONTINGENT PROFIT ACCRUED ON SHARES OF Nos.

Up to 28th February, 18	.	.	.
" " 1879 (Loss),	.	.	.	£39 7 3
" " 18	.	.	.

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

Russell had paid in instalments to the society £414, 8s., and in addition interest upon the full amount of the loan up to date.

On 8th March 1880 the liquidators, through their agents, issued a circular in which they intimated that, in consequence of the winding-up order, "borrowing members must pay up their debts."

The circular proceeded,—“As the assets of the society are realised, dividends will be declared among the members from time to time. In the case of ordinary members these dividends will be paid to them in cash. In the case of borrowing members the dividends will be placed against the loan, and so reduce the debt, and the interest running thereon.

“Seeing that no interest runs on the money at the credit of any shares it follows that until the loan is reduced by dividends, or payments made to account of the loan itself, the interest must continue to be paid on the full sum borrowed. But as all members who are not borrowers stop their contributions at the date of the order to wind up, it is clear that borrowing members must, to be placed on the same footing, be held to pay their subsequent instalments to account of the loan. The effect, then, of the winding-up order on borrowing members is that any instalments paid or dividends declared after its date go to diminish the debt, and reduce the corresponding interest, and not to increase the sum paid up on the shares or the stake of the members in the society.

“As already explained, the winding up prevents the subsequent withdrawal of members, and the result to borrowers paying off their debts is that loans, if paid up, must be paid in full. The liquidators are prepared, however, to entertain proposals in such cases for the payment or deposit of a sum of money to meet the contingencies of winding up, and so facilitate the realisation of the society's assets.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants.”

On 22d July 1880 Russell's agents wrote the agents of the liquidators as follows:—“We have been instructed by Mr James Russell, residing at 163 Greenhead Street, Glasgow, to intimate to you, as agents for the liquidators of this society, that he is prepared forthwith to pay, in terms of the rules, the balance due by him of the advance of £700 received on or about 16th May 1868, provided a discharge of the heritable bond executed by him on the said date in security of the said advance be granted by the liquidators. Mr Russell's monthly instalments at the date of the winding-up order amounted to £414, 8s., and he has paid subsequent to that date the sum of £24. In arriving at the balance due interest will fall to be credited to him on the amount of his instalments, in terms of rules 9 and 12. We shall be glad to know if the liquidators will accept this intimation as sufficient notice under the rules, and whether they will agree to discharge Mr Russell's bond in the manner now proposed.”

The liquidators' agents, on 23d July, accepted the above letter as equivalent to intimation to the society, but denied the right of any member to retire pending the liquidation, and they accordingly refused to accept the proffered payment.

On 4th October Russell presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, in which he prayed to have it found (1) that the loan of £700 obtained by him on 15th May 1868 had been extinguished pro tanto by £414, 8s., being the cumulo amount of instalments paid by him up to 20th February 1880 when the winding-up order was pronounced, and that the liquidators were bound to impute towards extinction of the balance of the loan any instalments paid, or to be paid, since that date; (2) that as a borrowing member of the society he was entitled, upon giving notice in terms of rule 12, and paying up the balance of the advance still due by him, with interest as therein provided, to withdraw from the society and receive a formal discharge of his bond; (3) that the liquidators were not entitled to set aside or pay away any part of the sum of £414, 8s. paid by him in extinction of the advance made to him to meet the losses of the members of the society inter se; and (4) that since the date of the winding-up order he was no longer liable in interest on the full sum of £700 advanced to him, but only on the balance of £285, 12s. There were two other cravings, which were, however, merely formal. The liquidators lodged answers, and a record was made up and closed.

No. 164

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

Pleaded for Russell;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the rules of the said society the instalments paid by the petitioner extinguished and were intended to extinguish pro tanto the amount of the said loan. (2) The petitioner, on a fair and reasonable construction of rule 12, and in conformity with the universal practice and custom of the society with regard to borrowing members, is entitled to withdraw from the said society upon payment of the balance of the said loan due by him. (3) The petitioner, being simply a debtor of the said society to the extent of his advance, is not liable to bear a share of the losses incurred by the non-borrowing members or shareholders of the society inter se. (4) The petitioner having paid interest on the full amount of his loan, without regard to the instalments thereof repaid from time to time, upon the footing that he would be entitled to participate in the profits of the society, and the said profits having been superseded by the liquidators, he is now only bound to pay interest upon the balance of the said advance.

Pleaded for the liquidators;—(1) Until the petitioner tenders payment of the balance of his debt and calls upon the liquidators in respect thereof to grant him a discharge the present application is premature and unnecessary. (3) The instalments paid by the petitioner having been paid to account of his shares in the society, and not to account of his debt, he is not entitled to credit therefor in the manner claimed by him. (4) The effect of the winding-up order is to equalise the rights and liabilities of all the persons who happened to be members of the society at its date, and to prevent the withdrawal of any members thereafter until the liquidation is completed. (5) As the instalments paid by all the members alike, whether such members have borrowed from the society or not, have been paid to account of such members' shares, to allow the pursuer or other borrowing members to impute such payments to account of their debt would produce inequality among the members, and is therefore illegal. (6) The losses, if any, sustained by the society, having been sustained in consequence of transactions entered into prior to the winding-up order before mentioned, and while the pursuer was still undoubtedly a member, he is not entitled, by giving notice of withdrawal, to escape his share of responsibility for such losses. (7) Except in so far as the same may be altered or modified by the terms of the Building Societies Act, 1874, and the winding-up order, the rules of the society still regulate the contract between the members thereof, and their several rights and liabilities as such members. The liquidators are therefore bound to enforce all fines and penalties for failure to make punctual payments in terms of said rules. (8) The pursuer having paid no more by way of instalments than any other member of the society of the same standing, and holding the same number of shares, he is not entitled in virtue of his having borrowed from the society to get interest on the sum so paid, while other members who have not borrowed are not getting interest.

Russell thereafter lodged a minute in which he formally tendered payment of the balance, which he admitted to be due by him conform to an account embodied therein.

The liquidators also lodged a minute to this effect:—"The said society

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

and liquidators admit that there are funds enough in their hands to pay all the debts due to third parties so far as these have been intimated to the liquidators, or have come to their knowledge. The society are in possession of certain properties under their bonds and otherwise are involved in questions of accounting and liability with superiors, prior bondholders and proprietors, and it is impossible at present to say what claims may thence arise, but the liquidators have no anticipation of not being able to meet all such claims out of the funds and effects in their hands."

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 22d February 1881, pronounced this interlocutor:—" Finds that the petitioner, James Russell, is a member of the Scottish Savings Investment and Building Society, holding twenty-eight shares, and that he obtained on 16th May 1868 a loan of £700 from the society, being the amount of his shares, for which he granted a bond and disposition in security over certain property in Crawford Street and Francis Street, Glasgow, the security having since been restricted on 28th October 1874 to the property in Francis Street: Finds that since the said 16th May 1868 the petitioner has regularly paid instalments on his shares to the amount in all of £414, 8s. as at 20th February 1880, the commencement of the liquidation, besides regularly paying interest thereon: Finds that the petitioner is not entitled to withdraw from the society on the terms set forth in the twelfth rule of the society: Finds that the petitioner is entitled, on paying up the balance of the said sum of £700, after deducting the amount of said instalments or subscriptions, being £285, 12s., with interest on the said £700 until payment of said balance and less discount at 4 per cent on the said sum of £285, 12s. from the date of payment to the date at which each instalment on said shares would have been payable under the rules, to receive from the respondents a discharge of his said bond and disposition in security, reserving hinc inde all rights and liabilities of the petitioner as a member of the said society; and with regard to the other cravings of the petition, appoints parties to be further heard on the 3d March next."*

* "NOTE.— In approaching the consideration of the questions which have been presented with great ability for the decision of the Court it is to be noticed that in the rules of this society the usual provision for redeeming the securities of borrowing members is entirely wanting. Such cases, therefore, as Priestly and Hopwood, 10 L. J. N. S. 646, and Burgess's case in the liquidation of the Doncaster Permanent Building Society, L. R. 3 Eq. 158, which dealt with the rights of parties under redemption clauses, while they are useful by way of illustration, afford little direct assistance in construing the rules before me.

"The main question is whether the applicant is entitled to withdraw from the society upon the terms specified in rules nine and twelve. The respondents say, with much force, that it is common law and statute law that after a winding-up order no such change can take place in the relation of members to the society. 'The Companies Act, 1862,' sec. 131, expressly provides that all transfers of shares and alterations in the status of members taking place after the commencement of the winding up shall be void. And, whether that provision is or is not applicable to liquidators under the section of the 'Building Societies Act, 1875,' it seems plain that the same result follows from the ordinary principles of bankruptcy law and common sense. The rights of parties in a winding-up are necessarily fixed as they were at its commencement. It seemed to be contended for the applicant, that as a borrowing member he was not really a shareholder of the society; that he was merely its debtor, and that on paying up his debt in the way and to the amount fixed by his contract he was entitled to be free from all further responsibility. I do not think that this view can be reconciled either with the contract and the rules of the society, with the English cases, or with the general principles on which building societies are constituted. There are indeed, as is contended, two classes of members, borrowing and invest-

On 19th March 1881 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this further interlocutor:—"Under the last order refuses the third craving in the

No. 164.
July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

ing members, but both are members and both are liable, as the cases referred to and others shew, to be made contributories. The whole phraseology of the rules shews that borrowing members are simply those who take payment of their shares in advance, and out of whose interest, fines, and bonuses the profits of the society are made. In some societies it appears that borrowing members do not share in the profits, which are accumulated and divided at the realisation of shares, or when withdrawals take place; and in such societies there would, I imagine, be at least plausibility in contending that no liability for losses should attach to them. But, here, borrowing members, paying up the whole instalments on their shares with interest, not only are released from their debts to the society, but leave the society taking with them a part of the interest they have paid in name of profit. And so far as appears from anything in the rules, or in the process and argument, they have set apart for them from year to year precisely the same proportion of profits pertaining to their payments as the unadvanced members. In these circumstances there can be no reason why they should not be placed on the list of contributories precisely as other members; and this is what appears to have been done in England.

"Now, if this be so, how can they be allowed to withdraw on the terms proposed? The suggestion would hardly be made, I think, if the question were with third parties, outside creditors, or even with members who have given due notice of withdrawal before liquidation, and who must be dealt with as creditors. But the applicant has averred, and it is virtually admitted, that all creditors are paid, or at least that the liquidators have funds to pay them, so that the question is really one as to the rights of shareholders inter se. In such a question the case of Burgess, cited above, lends some support to the applicant's contention, for there, the society's debts having been paid, a call was suspended as to borrowing members who had been allowed to redeem, the call being made only for the purpose of paying up the other shareholders. This, however, was done entirely because the rules gave a certain power of redemption by paying up at once all future instalments, and provided that on that being done advanced shareholders should at once cease to be members. It may be said, that although the rules of this society contain no provision for redemption, the clause as to withdrawal at the end of rule twelve is really equivalent, for as Lord Cranworth said in Fleming v. Selfe, 24 L. J., Ch. 29, 'redemption is in truth withdrawing.' I cannot, however, look at this rule as giving the absolute power for which the applicant contends. The object of the liquidation is, after paying creditors, to give the members equality of rights and liabilities according to their respective interests in the society. Now, as I have said, both classes of members in this society participate in profits, and each year the contingent profits—so called, because those of each year are liable to be reduced or wiped off by the losses of a subsequent year—are credited in the books to each member in proportion to his capital arising from instalments and profits, and to the time such capital has been in the society. When a member of either kind withdraws it is true that he is not entitled to receive these profits, either as an addition to the instalments which are then repaid to the unadvanced member, or as a deduction from the balance of the debt, &c., paid up by the borrowing member. But in lieu of profits both classes of members are allowed interest on the instalments paid upon their shares, at stipulated rates, corresponding to the length of membership. This is provided by the ninth rule in regard to unadvanced members, and the twelfth rule provides for withdrawal of a borrowing member on paying up 'the whole of his debts, interests, and penalties, after deducting the amount of the monthly instalments paid upon his shares, with interest thereon, calculated at the rates referred to in rule nine.' Now, it is impossible to read the twelfth rule as giving the borrowing member a right to withdraw stronger than, or superior to, that of the investing members under rule nine. It follows, if withdrawal is allowed after a winding-up order, that each member, whether advanced or unadvanced, will have an equal right to give notice of withdrawal, and thus a

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

petition: Finds and orders that if the petitioner should not elect to pay up the balance of the loan of £700, as stated in the previous interlocutor, winding-up order would, in such a society, be no longer a means of equalising the rights of all members according to their interests at its date, but would be just the starting point of a race for preferences, members withdrawing being paid out (rule nine) in the order of their application. This theory is therefore entirely inconsistent with the very idea of a liquidation. Moreover, it is obvious that the provision for payment of interest to withdrawing members is intended to apply to the society while carrying on business, and presumably earning profits exceeding in amount the interest allowed at this time, and in a liquidation it does not appear, and is not even alleged, that the funds permit of this interest being paid, without creating inequality and injustice to other members. It may be as the result of the liquidation that the applicant and others, who might be equally willing to withdraw at the present time, will all get interest on their instalments to the amount which he claims, but it does not seem to me that he has established, or relevantly averred, right to a preference over other members, such as to entitle him to get this interest now, and whether they get it or not. I therefore refuse the second prayer of the petition.

"To the other more important demand of the petitioner, viz., that it should be found that he is entitled to have his instalments or subscriptions credited to him as pro tanto repayment of his loan, I am not prepared to give so decided a refusal. Although there is not the usual provision for redemption in this society's rules, it seems to be unreasonable, when a liquidation has taken place, not only to keep the petitioner in the society as a member and a contributor, but to prevent him from paying up his loan and relieving his property from the security which the respondents hold over it. It may be very important for him to be able to deal freely with his property. The respondents have no right to retain that security except for the loan of £700. It is said that he can only have a discharge of the bond on paying up the whole £700, and that he must leave the instalments paid upon the loan to stand as his stake in the society, which may or may not be repaid to him at the close of the liquidation. I cannot adopt this construction of the rules. By the rules, and, indeed, according to the fundamental conception of building societies as they are usually constituted, advanced members are both members of the society and borrowers from it; and the normal and usual way of repaying their loans is by paying precisely the same monthly instalments as investing members. The difference is that the instalments of the latter go to make up a fund of capital which is repaid with profit to the investing member when his shares are realised—i.e., are fully paid up—while the instalments of the former go to repay the advance which the advanced member has received on his shares, and for which he has given security. When all his shares are paid up he is entitled of right to have his security discharged, and if the society were carrying on business in the normal way he would doubtless (though in this case the rules are silent) be free to quit the society. He is entitled, as we have seen, to withdraw while the society carries on business, on paying up not the whole loan, but the balance, after reckoning his instalments, &c., and he may have his insurance and his security restricted, as has been done in Mr Russell's case, in proportion to the payment made 'on his shares.' Looking to the whole conception of the rules and to the general idea of such societies, it might be plausibly argued even in a question with third parties, creditors, that the mortgaged property of a borrowing member could not be made available except to the extent of the balance of the lent money after deducting the instalments paid to account of his shares. But in a case where only fellow-shareholders are concerned it admits of no doubt. It might almost be regarded as a simple case of setting off against the debt the amount which the petitioner holds of the stock of the society, and therefore, in a question inter socios, a setting off which the borrowing member would be entitled to plead under the last clause of section 101 of the 'Companies Act, 1862.' But in the actual circumstances it is better to call it a set-off which Mr Russell is entitled to plead in virtue of the contract between him and the society, which contem-he is not bound since the 20th day of February 1880 to pay interest on the full amount of the said advance or loan of £700, but only on the sum of £285, 12s., being the balance due by him as at the said date after crediting the sum of £414, 8s. paid to account or in respect thereof; and quoad ultra, in respect of no opposition, finds and orders in terms of the remaining part of fourth craving: Finds it unnecessary to order as craved in the 5th place, in respect it is stated at the bar that the liquidators are about to issue a statement to the members of the society; refuses the sixth craving hoc statu.”

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

The liquidators appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The payments made by Russell were instalments to meet the price of his shares, and were in no way referable to the loan. The liquidation prevented Russell from retiring under rule 12, and remaining a shareholder he should bear his share of the losses incurred along with his fellow-shareholders.¹

Argued for Russell;—The payments were made in extinction of the loan. This was apparent from the fact that the subjects disposed in the bond were insured for smaller sums as the balance due became less. Russell having no interest but as a borrower in the society was entitled to withdraw on complying with the rules of the society as to borrowers, and the liquidation, which was unnecessary, and the voluntary act of the shareholders, did not affect his rights.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This is a peculiar case, as the appellants' counsel remarked in the course of the discussion. The society of which we have heard, The Scottish Savings Investment and Building Society, is in the exceptional and fortunate position, so far as I can see, of being unable to contract any debts. The society may make money if it can, but it can incur no debts. There are shareholders in the society, and they hold shares of the amount of—that is to say, the utmost amount that can be paid upon any share is—£25; and the business of the society consists in lending the money of those who pay it in and do not borrow to those who require funds, generally, I suppose, to those who require to borrow plated repayment of the loan in the way in which he has been paying it, and no other. The applicant is therefore entitled to a discharge of the bond and disposition in security granted to the society on payment of the balance of his loan due at 20th February 1880, less discount.

“The chief difficulty which occurs to me as arising from this determination is that the applicant remains a member of the society, although he will thus have paid up, so far as I am able to see, all that he can be asked to contribute. For the 14th section of the ‘Building Society Act, 1874,’ limits his liability to ‘the amount payable on his shares under any mortgage or other security or under the rules of the society,’ and this he will have paid. It may, however, be that, even under this clause, his liability is not exhausted; and in any view, if this judgment is sound, and if the liquidators' opinion as to the results of the liquidation is correct, it is probable that he will not desire to quit the society, seeing that possibly the only effect of his remaining connected with it may be to entitle him to dividends and not to subject him to losses.

“It does not appear that the remaining portions of the prayer of the petition can be satisfactorily disposed of at present. They are partly involved in the decision already arrived at, and partly are matter for adjustment in the course of the liquidation. It is possible, however, that the parties may wish to have the case in such a position as to enable an appeal to be taken, and I have appointed a further hearing chiefly for that purpose.”

¹ Seagrave v. Pope, Feb. 26, 1862, 1 De Gex, M'N., and Gor. 783; Mosley v. Baker, Jan. 30, 1849, 3 De Gex, M'N., and Gor. 1032.

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

without paying in. This is chiefly done, as it is the main object of the society to do, to members who are to build; and the security afforded to the society for their advances is a conveyance of the ground on which the proposed buildings are to be erected. If the loans are providently and prudently made and regularly paid up with interest there will be a profit to those whose money is so lent, that is, to those who have contributed money to the society, but not borrowed any. Otherwise there will be a loss to them. There cannot be a greater loss to the whole of them than the whole money which the whole of them have contributed, but there may be a loss of that or of anything short of that.

Now, it appears that, on account, I suppose, of the amount or number of undertakings which speculative builders have entered into, and the amount of money which they have borrowed, the borrowers, and the securities which they granted, have proved not satisfactory, to some extent at least; so that the contributing members—the investing members—those members who are looking to this as a mode of advancing their money securely and profitably—were to that extent disappointed. But there were other borrowers of a different description, among whom, apparently, is Mr Russell, the respondent in this petition and in this appeal. He was a good customer, and he paid back in instalments, as he had contracted to do, the loan which had been advanced to him, and the property which he had given in security was apparently good. He had paid no money into the society for the purpose of being lent to other people. On the contrary, as I have indicated, he was a borrower and not a lender, and the transaction with him might be a loss to those whose money he had undoubtedly borrowed, but no gain to himself, unless he could otherwise profitably use the borrowed money for himself. But it occurred to those who had lost money on the transactions of the society in connection with less profitable customers that they might impound certain payments which Mr Russell, and, I suppose, others in the same position, had made in pursuance of their contract to repay the loan by instalments, and thus enable them to get back their share of the loss which would otherwise fall upon them through their improvident lending to other people. And in order to attain this end, which it was, at least at one time, frankly admitted could not be done under the rules of the society, or the contract between the society and Mr Russell, they put the society into liquidation, and pleaded that that which could not be done before liquidation could be done after it.

Now, I must say I think this was a very questionable proceeding. I do not think there was any legitimate occasion for the liquidation of a society of this kind at all, which could incur no debts, and which had therefore no debts to pay. It was stated to us that any losses that might be incurred must of necessity be met by the contributions which had been paid in—by the actual money which was in; and in these circumstances it seemed to be a question of the extent to which those who had paid in money in that way were to be entitled to get it back, or should be able to get it back. But it is in vain to say that such a society required a liquidator. Any shareholder of this society, moreover, is entitled to leave it upon a month's notice. The respondent's counsel was perfectly right. A shareholder does not require to remain in until he has paid up his £25; and if he has paid up the arrears due according to his undertaking—it may be 2s. a-week, or 4s., or 6s.—if he has paid up all those arrears, although his payments may only have been to the extent of a few pounds, he is *led to bid them good-bye, and be off.

In this way there is no case here, and no possibility of a case here, such as No. 164. occurs in liquidations with which we are familiar—in which a liquidator is calling upon a party, a partner in a limited liability company, for example, to contribute the unpaid amount of his shares; or in the case of an unlimited liability company calling upon him to pay such an amount as may be necessary to meet the debts of the company. There is no case of that kind. The contributions of the shareholders of this society are in shillings a-week, and if all the instalments are paid up the shareholders are entitled to shake themselves free at any time.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

And this, it should be remembered, is provided by the rules of the society and by the Act of Parliament. The mode of borrowing here, it is true, is a peculiar one. A party becomes a shareholder of as many shares as, when fully paid up, will amount to the loan which he desires, or which is agreed to be granted to him, as was done here. The loan agreed upon being £700, the proposed borrower must become a shareholder of as many shares of £25 each as will amount to £700. Thereupon, the security being satisfactory, the £700 is advanced, to be repaid as clause 12 of the rules of the society, which constitute part of the bargain with the borrower, provides, by monthly instalments, with interest at the rate of five per cent. It was agreed between them that these monthly instalments in repayment of the loan should be put to the credit of the borrower as if it had been money paid up upon his shares—not that it was so in reality, but that it should be put to his credit as if it were so.

Accordingly, after he had paid between £400 and £500, Mr Russell considered, and he was entitled to consider, that his loan had been repaid to that extent,—that is to say, that his debt to the society had been discharged to that amount—for that is the meaning of the words in clause 12 which were acted upon, viz., that the advances were to be repaid by monthly instalments. He was not then entitled to cease to be a shareholder, for, in the first place, the Act of Parliament which applies to such societies as this provides that the liability in respect of any shares upon which an advance has been made shall be limited to the amount payable thereon under any mortgage or other security, or under the rules of the society. He was therefore under a liability in respect of the shares which he held for the advances made thereon, and the mortgage granted in respect of said advances in so far as not repaid. But in so far as repaid by instalments there was not to be a second repayment. He was liable upon the mortgage for the unpaid balance of the debt. Upon that payment being made his shares are paid up and his debt is discharged, and his liability ceases by the Act of Parliament. As was pointed out by the appellants' counsel, however, this provision is made by the Act subject to this, that the rules of the society may provide differently. The provision of the statute, and the primary provision, is, that if a shareholder has borrowed money upon his shares, granting a mortgage, his liability is limited to the amount borrowed, that is, to his liability under the mortgage. But the rules of the society may provide otherwise.

But do the rules of the society provide otherwise? Clause 12 provides that the advances shall be repaid by monthly instalments. That is the beginning of it; and the end of it is—"It shall also be lawful at all times for a member who has obtained an advance to withdraw from the society upon giving the society one month's notice in writing, and paying up the whole of his debt, interest, and penalties, after deducting the amount of the monthly instalments paid upon his shares, with the interest thereon."

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

Now, Mr Russell proposes to withdraw precisely in accordance with the Act, and with those very words which I have read. And the other parties say—"Well, we could not, according to the fair meaning of these words and the understanding of the parties, and the honesty of the contract between us, have refused to allow you to go on making that payment of the balance due upon that footing." But then they appeal, as I said at the outset, to a liquidator. They call in a liquidator for no other purpose except to enable them to do a thing contrary to the good faith of the contract which they had made, and subject a mere borrower, upon a contract which he had purchased with a premium, to an impounding of what, according to that contract, were to be imputed as instalments in payment of a debt. Instead of acting according to the good faith of that contract they say to him—"But you are the borrower of £700, with no part of it paid up, and under the security we are entitled to sell your property, on the ground that no part of the debt has ever been paid"—for that would be the legitimate result.

I am of opinion that the law is altogether against that. I think the true view of the case, upon the statute, upon the contract, and upon the rules of the society—for they are all in harmony—is, that Mr Russell is bound to pay his debt in so far as the instalments which he has already paid do not cover it—principal, and interest at five per cent; and that upon that being done, then, according to the rules, and the statute, and the contract itself, his shares are fully paid up, and he ceases to be a shareholder, and that upon making the payment of the balance due now he is, in terms of the very language with which rule 12 concludes, entitled to withdraw from the society without remaining under any further obligation.

LORD CRAIGHILL—I am of the opinion which has just been expressed by my brother Lord Young.

The question raised here is one of great importance, not merely to members of this society, but to members of similar societies; and it is with considerable difficulty that I have arrived at what I consider to be a satisfactory conclusion. In the end, however, I have come to be very clearly of opinion that what has now been pointed out by Lord Young is the true result, and that accordingly effect ought to be given to that result in the interlocutor about to be pronounced.

The building society in question was established prior to 1868, and early in that year the pursuer, Mr Russell, who is the respondent in the appeal, became a member, and soon after he did that which many members of the society did, viz., applied for a loan from the funds of the society, and his application having been entertained and granted, he became a debtor to the society in the sum of £700. In security of the advance he subscribed for shares in the society amounting in the aggregate to that sum, and granted a bond and disposition in security over the property in respect of which he received the money.

Now, from 1868 down to 1880, when this society went into liquidation, Mr Russell fulfilled all the obligations incumbent upon him. And what he undertook to do was this, to pay in monthly instalments towards the extinction of the debt he was due to the society, or to make up the amount of the shares of which he had subscribed himself the holder. When the order for the winding up of the society came into force in February of this year he had repaid the principal in instalments amounting to £414, 8s., and he became desirous of withdrawing from the society, and gave the liquidators notice to that effect through his agents, but the liquidators, instead of acceding to his request, made the demand that he should of new begin to pay up the instalments of the principal, as if none of it had ever been paid. The £414 which had been paid in monthly instalments had remained in the hands of the society, and it reasonably seemed as if Mr Russell's debt had been extinguished to that extent. This the liquidators would not allow, and accordingly the present action was raised for the purpose of determining the question. Mr Russell seeks to have it found that upon payment of the sum forming the difference between £414—the amount of the instalments—and £700—the amount of the advance—he is to be entitled to a discharge of his bond; and that the whole amount of the shares which he subscribed for having been met, he is to be looked upon as having ceased to be a member of the society.

No. 164.
July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

Now, I am of opinion that, according to the Act of Parliament, according to the law, and according to the contract between the parties, as that contract is expressed, not merely in the bond and relative memorandum, but in the laws and regulations of the society, this is a contention on the part of Mr Russell that ought to be allowed. I think it would be a very strange thing, indeed, if the contract of the parties was not a contract by which both parties were to be bound.

And in regard to this matter, I must be allowed here to say that it appears to me to be quite immaterial that the society has gone into liquidation. I look upon it that the issue to be tried and determined is simply this:—As at the date of the liquidation—February 1880—no payments having been made subsequent to that time, what was the amount of the debt due upon the bond that had been granted by Mr Russell to the society? If £700 had remained due upon that bond undoubtedly the society would be entitled to demand payment; but if the debt which is represented by that bond has been reduced by monthly instalments to something over £200, then the society, upon receiving payment of the difference, are, as I think, bound to give Mr Russell a discharge of the bond, and all the shares for which he subscribed having been thus paid for, Mr Russell necessarily, and according to the rules of the society, ceased to be a member of the society. The contention maintained for the liquidators would lead to an extraordinary result, for the contention, and any decision giving effect to it, would have been the same supposing that in place of £414 having been paid by Mr Russell in monthly instalments he had paid the full sum of £700. It would still have been said that although £700 had been paid in monthly instalments yet the amount of the loan remained as much as it was when first granted.

That, no one can deny, would be a very strange result, but, strange or not, it is a result against which the rules of the society are, as I think, quite sufficient. That repayments have been made to the extent of £414 is not matter of controversy. That which is controverted is whether they were paid on account of shares, leaving the amount of the bond unaffected, or whether—paid on account of shares or not—the condition on which payment was made was that to the extent of each payment the debt due should be diminished. If each payment on account of shares represents also a payment on account of money for which the bond was granted, by each payment there is necessarily reduced the amount of the debt due to the society.

Now, it appears to me that according to the rules, and particularly according to rule 12, this is the result, and the only result, at which we can reasonably

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

arrive. The first sentence of section 12 does not appear to me to be susceptible of any other interpretation, because that which is thereby provided is, that "all advances shall be repaid by monthly instalments with interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, and which interest shall be paid monthly in advance, and at the same time as the instalments." Is that law for the society, and is it law for every borrower of the society who is also a member of the society? If it is, it appears to me that the result of every payment is to extinguish to the extent of every payment the debt that was due. And this does not stand alone, but must be read in connection with the clause adverted to by my brother Lord Young, at the end of article 12—"It shall be lawful at all times for a member who has obtained an advance to withdraw from the society upon giving the manager one month's notice in writing, and paying up the whole of his debt, interest, and penalties, after deducting the amount of the monthly instalments paid upon his shares, with the interest thereon." All monthly payments made on account of shares are called payments of debt, and this appears to me to be according to the true construction, the true result being this, that a member who pays on account of shares, if he is a borrowing member, when he pays monthly instalments also and necessarily pays the amount of his debt. Mr Russell paid on account of shares, and with reference to the number of his shares, but he was also a debtor on the bond, and when he made a payment he made a payment on account of this bond as well as on account of shares; and to the extent of the payment thus made the debt due to the society was, in my opinion, reduced, the consequence being, that after the liquidation the amount of the debt, which was £700 to start with, had been reduced by the amount stated. The amount of the instalments that had been made, and the interest upon these instalments, was a payment on account of debt due, and that to which the society were entitled, as a condition of granting a discharge, was the difference between £414 and £700.

No doubt there are things in the transactions between the parties following upon membership and upon this bond which appear at first sight to be inconsistent with the result at which I have arrived; but I think there is that in the laws of the society itself which shews what in truth was the reality of these payments—that they were payments, I do not say not on account of shares, but being, it may be, on account of shares, on account of debt also.

This was a loan over house property, and it is provided by rule 14 that when the society elect a member on the security of house property they are entitled to insure to the full extent at the cost of the member, so that in the event of the destruction of the property the society could recover from the insurance company as much at least as would extinguish the debt due to them. Now, how would that matter stand if some instalments had been paid? Does not the power of the company to insure become limited as the amount of their debt is paid up? They are not entitled in such circumstances to insure for the full sum, or to take the full sum, supposing instalments have been paid in extinction of the debt. All that they are entitled at their own hands to do, at the cost of the member who is their debtor, is to insure the property for such a sum as will cover the amount lent and not repaid. And how is this result secured? Simply by the payments that have been made from time to time diminishing the amount of the original debt in respect of which the society could make any claim. I do not think it is for the society, in reason, to contest the soundness of this deduction. If there had been no payments to account—payments due under the bond—there could be no reason why the society should not insure for the full amount. But there was to be a limitation in the case suggested, and that limitation was regulated by the amount of the monthly instalments which, as at the particular period when the insurance was effected, had been paid to the society.

The necessary inference is, that according to what was the reality of the transaction and the legality of it, the sum that was paid on account of the member or debtor—whether you call it on account of shares or of instalments—was a sum by which the debt represented in the bond was extinguished. That was the purpose of the thing. I do not think there was anything of the nature of keeping up a debt on the one hand and giving credit for shares on the other. On the contrary, what was done was in fulfilment of an obligation to pay instalments upon certain shares, and, fulfilling this obligation, at the same time to extinguish a debt which had been constituted by a loan given to Mr Russell by the society.

Upon these grounds I am humbly of opinion that that which has been suggested by my brother Lord Young is the judgment which should be pronounced.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur entirely in the result at which your Lordships have arrived; and as this question is one of very great interest to a large body of the people, I think it right to express in a word or two the grounds on which I have arrived at that result. I think the case a very important one; and, moreover, I think the demand that is here made is a very unjust one, for it means nothing but this, that this liquidator wishes to exact payment of a debt which has been already discharged. It has no other meaning. If the liquidator succeeded in this case that would be the only result.

This association had two objects to serve, and they were quite distinct. One was the ordinary object of an investing society, in order to make profit of the interest of their money; the other was to enable members to borrow money to carry on building speculations on terms that were accessible to the class who generally belonged to the association. It appears to me that in better times this association was entirely successful. But in regard to the first, it was to get a return for the money, and the second was to get the advantage of a loan on terms which they could meet.

Now, to that second class belonged the respondent, and that was his only character in the transaction from first to last. He was a borrowing member, and the provisions of the contract with the parties, as far as he is concerned, are those relating to borrowing members, and no other. The loan is a peculiar one, and very profitable to the lender, because he was to get full interest on the whole of his money, while the borrower was bound to pay into his coffers, whatever the terms and conditions of the payment of interest might be, certain instalments which in the end, if continued, would liquidate the whole of the advance. That was manifestly a great advantage, for not only was the full interest paid upon the whole debt, but the instalments themselves were rendered available for the earning of other interest.

Now, the respondent says he has paid up a certain amount of his loan; and if the monthly instalments referred to are to be imputed to repayments of the loan there can be no doubt he is right. There is little dispute upon that matter. But the liquidator says he has not paid anything towards repayment of the loan,

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

No. 164.

July 7, 1881.
Liquidators of
the Scottish
Savings and Investment
Building
Society v.
Russell.

because the instalments were paid to account of the money due on his shares as if he had been an investing member. And so the real object of this proceeding is to compel the respondent to pay over again what he has already paid. It has no other object, and that is an object which, in my opinion, is directly in the face of the precise terms of the Act of Parliament. It is contended—and that is one of the pleas of the appellant here—that these instalments were not attributable to the loan, and that therefore the loan remains the same as if the instalments never had been paid. That view also proceeds in direct opposition to the precise words of article 12, which provides not only that the instalments may be taken into consideration, but provides that the debt shall be paid in that manner and in no other, for it is the nature of the provision in article 12 that these advances shall be paid by instalments. I daresay the manager of the association might accept payment otherwise—and there are provisions to that effect for certain circumstances—but the normal condition is that the instalments shall be paid by the borrowing member for no other purpose whatever but to extinguish the debt. He is bound to extinguish it in that way.

It is perfectly true that interest was paid upon the whole sum, and that is not an unimportant element in this matter. That was for the greater security of the company, and those payments or instalments doubtless remained in the hands of the company, while interest was paid on the whole debt; but that does not derogate from the clear provision, first, in the opening sentence of the 12th article, which provides that the debt shall be so paid, and secondly, from the concluding clause, which is couched in terms so precise that it is utterly impossible to mistake it.

Therefore I think that this demand of the liquidator is a most inequitable one, because the real meaning of it, as I have said, is to compel this party who has paid instalments under the Act of Parliament to pay them over again.

It is said that the company is in liquidation, and I must plainly say that, listening to the argument as I have done, I am at a loss to know what that means. It is not in liquidation of its debts, for there are none of those. It is not in liquidation of anything arising out of the investing part of its business, because the investing members do not owe anything to each other, and they do not owe anything to the outer world. There can be no liquidation with the borrowing members, for this simple reason, that if they are not only borrowing but investing members they will simply lose that money pro rata along with the rest of them. The way in which the investing members suffer, which is the only pretext for liquidation, is that they do not get so much for their money as they expected. There is no other. And if the borrower here had been an investing member, or held to be such, there would be so much the less profit, in proportion to the amount he had invested. Therefore, with Lord Young, I am utterly at a loss to comprehend on what ground liquidation is proceeding. It seems to me that liquidation is not the term to be applied to the winding up of the affairs of the company, if the company is to be put a stop to. I do not suppose they are to stop, and I think this is a mere device to raise this question, which has for its aim the compelling a man to pay his debt twice over.

I therefore think we had better affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. He no doubt finds that in the present condition of the company the respondent is not entitled to withdraw, but I apprehend that that only means that he is not entitled to withdraw independently of having his bond cancelled. Cancellation of the bond would, I daresay, be quite enough to obviate any objection of that sort.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the No. 164. Sheriff of 22d February 1881 appealed against: Find that the advance or loan of £700 obtained by the respondent (pursuer) July 7, 1881. from the Scottish Savings Investment and Building Society, registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874, and having its Liquidators of Savings and Investment Building Society v. Russell. registered office at 53 West Regent Street, Glasgow, has pro tanto been extinguished by the sum of £414, 8s. 0d., being the amount in cumulo of instalments from time to time paid by the respondent to account or in respect thereof from 15th May 1868 to 20th February 1880, when the said society was, by the Court, appointed to be wound up, and that the appellants are bound to impute towards extinction of the said advance or loan all instalments paid to them by the respondent since 20th February 1880, or which may yet be paid, to account or in respect thereof: Find that the respondent, as a borrowing member of the said society, on giving notice in terms of rule twelve of the said society, and upon payment to the appellants of the difference between the said sum of £700 and the amount in cumulo of the instalments paid by him to account or in respect of the said advance or loan, with interest due to him thereon calculated or added thereto, in terms of rule nine of the said society, is entitled to withdraw therefrom, and that the appellants are bound thereupon to execute a formal discharge of the bond and disposition in security for £700, dated and recorded in the Register of Sasines for Renfrewshire and regality of Glasgow, &c., 16th May 1868, and granted by the respondent to the trustees for the said society in security of the said advance or loan: Find the respondent entitled to expenses in the Sheriff Court and in this Court, and remit to the Auditor," &c.

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—R. H. MILLER, L.A.—Agents.

GEORGE BARRON (Trustee upon John Mitchell's sequestrated Estate), No. 165. Petitioner.—Strachan.

JOHN MITCHELL, Respondent.—Salvesen.

July 8, 1881.
Barron v.
Mitchell.

Bankrupt—"Estate" under section 103 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856—Schoolmaster's salary.—The trustee on the sequestrated estate of a teacher in a burgh school presented a petition under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, praying the Lord Ordinary to declare all right and interest which belonged or might belong to the bankrupt in the salary and emoluments of his office to belong to the trustee, until the bankrupt's debts should be paid, but subject to payment by the trustee to the bankrupt of a reasonable allowance for his maintenance.

Held that as the bankrupt held the office at the date of his sequestration the emoluments subsequently accruing therefrom were not "estate acquired by the bankrupt" after the date of his sequestration in the sense of section 103 of the Act, and petition dismissed.

Opinion (per Lord Fraser, Ordinary) that the section does not apply to fees earned by the personal labour of a bankrupt after the date of his sequestration.

THE estates of John Mitchell, English master in Elgin Academy, were 1ST DIVISION. sequestrated under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and a trustee Lord Fraser. appointed early in 1881. At that date Mitchell was in receipt of an M. income of £200 per annum, composed of school-fees and salary.

The trustee brought this petition under the 103d section* of the

* The section is quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note.

No. 165.
 July 8, 1881.
 Barron v.
 Mitchell.

Bankruptcy Act, 1856, praying the Court "to declare all right and interest which belongs and may belong to the bankrupt in the salary and emoluments attaching to the foresaid office held by him to be vested in the petitioner as trustee foresaid as at the date when the same has or may become payable, to the same effect as is provided by the said statute in respect to estates vested in the bankrupt as at the date of the sequestration, and that until the debts due by the bankrupt as at the said date are duly satisfied and paid, or until your Lordship shall make order to the contrary, but subject always to the payment by the petitioner to the bankrupt out of said salary and emoluments of such reasonable allowance for his maintenance and support as to your Lordship may seem proper."

The petition set forth—"The bankrupt is a teacher in one of the burgh schools of Elgin, and the salary and emoluments attaching to his office amount to at least £200 per annum. . . . Since the date of the said sequestration the bankrupt has acquired right to the portion of the said salary and emoluments which have fallen due since that date, and he will further have right to the said salary and emoluments so long as he holds the said office of teacher in the said school."

The petition did not state on what tenure the teacher held his office, but it was stated at the bar that his appointment was ad vitam aut culpam.

Mitchell stated in answer that his income, which consisted of £40 of salary and £160 of fees, was barely sufficient for the maintenance of his wife and family in such a condition as became his position, and that it fluctuated.

He pleaded;—(1) The statements in the petition being irrelevant, the petition ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (2) The respondent not having acquired right to any "estate," in the sense of the section quoted in the petition, the same should be dismissed. (3) In any event, the respondent's income not being in excess of a reasonable aliment for himself and family, the prayer of the petition should be refused.

The Lord Ordinary, on 10th June 1881, found the allegations not relevant to support the application, and refused the petition.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The bankrupt, since the sequestration, has, in order to obtain a subsistence for himself and family, continued to teach in the Elgin schools, and has obtained thereby an income amounting to £200 per annum. The question now is whether this is an 'estate' which can be declared vested in the trustee under the 103d section, the words of which are as follows:—

"If any estate, wherever situated, shall, after the date of the sequestration, and before the bankrupt has obtained his discharge, be acquired by him, or descend or revert or come to him, the same shall ipso jure fall under the sequestration, and the full right and interest accruing thereon to the bankrupt shall be held as transferred to and vested in the trustee as at the date of the acquisition thereof or succession, for the purposes of this Act; and the trustee shall, on coming to the knowledge of the fact, present a petition setting forth the circumstances to the Lord Ordinary, who shall appoint intimation to be made in the Gazette, and require all concerned to appear within a certain time for their interest; and after the expiration of such time, and no cause being shewn to the contrary, the Lord Ordinary shall declare all right and interest in such estate which belongs to the bankrupt to be vested in the trustee as at the date of the acquisition thereof, or succession thereto, to the same effect as is hereinbefore enacted in regard to the other estates.' It is further declared by this section that if the bankrupt do not immediately notify to the trustee that such estate has been acquired, or has come to him as aforesaid, he shall forfeit all the benefits of the Act.

"The word 'estate' is defined as follows in the interpretation clause (sec. 4),—'The words "property" and "estate" shall, when not expressly restricted,

The petitioner reclaimed.

No. 165.

Argued for the petitioner;—The law, as stated by Mr Bell, Comms. i. 127 and 128 (M'Laren's ed., 123 and 124), favoured the petitioner's claim. A July 8, 1881.
clergyman's stipend was arrestable.¹ So, too, was the salary of a professor of Barron v. Mitchell.

include every kind of property, heritable or moveable, wherever situated, and all rights, powers, and interest therein capable of legal alienation, or of being affected by diligence, or attached for debt.'

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the fees from the personal labour of a bankrupt are not the kind of estate which is here contemplated. The trustee in the sequestration has no right to direct that the bankrupt, say a professional man, an advocate, a physician, or dentist, shall proceed to labour and earn money to be handed over to him, the trustee, for the payment of the creditors; and if he has no such right to order the bankrupt so to labour for the creditors' behoof, it seems logically to follow that if the bankrupt voluntarily does so the trustee cannot demand from him the produce of his brains. In the present case the petitioner, the trustee, is willing, as he states in the petition, to allow the bankrupt to retain as much as will be a subsistence to himself and his family, and only claims the surplus not required for that purpose. This implies, if it be a sound position, that the trustee has a right to insist upon the bankrupt continuing his profession for the benefit of his creditors—a doctrine for which, under the present bankrupt laws, there is no authority whatever.

"Cases similar to this must have frequently occurred in Scotland, where professional men, in order to live during the pendency of the sequestration, continue in the exercise of their profession. But there is no instance of any demand having been made, or at all events successfully made, by the trustee to claim a vesting order in the fees which the bankrupt earns. The question, however, seems to have occurred frequently in England. The result of the decisions there seems to be this, that the trustee has no right to seize the profits of the bankrupt's personal and daily labour. In one of these cases (ex parte Vine, 28 March 1874, 8 Chan. Div. 366), Lord Justice James said, 'The general principle always has been, that until a bankrupt has obtained his discharge all his property is divisible among his creditors. But an exception was absolutely necessary in order that the bankrupt might not be an outlaw—a mere slave to his trustee; he could not be prevented from earning his own living.' This was only following up the leading case in the time of Lord Mansfield, of Chippendall v. Tomlinson, 4 Dougl. 318. But this case has been distinguished in England from other cases, where the bankrupt continues to carry on his business by means of servants and skilled workmen, and the Courts have held that the returns here must be accounted for to the trustee. Thus a bankrupt, acting as a furniture-broker, employing men and vans, and an apothecary supplying medicines, were not considered as merely using personal labour in this sense—(Crofton v. Poole, 1 B. and Ad. 568; Elliott v. Clayton, 16 Q. B. 581); and Mr Justice Fry, in a recent case dealing with the estate of a bankrupt architect, held that his trustee was entitled to sue for remuneration due in respect of professional work done in the bankrupt's office since his bankruptcy for plans there prepared, and for damages for breach of an alleged contract to employ the bankrupt in his professional capacity—(Emden v. Carte, 11th April 1881). This class of cases, however, differs essentially from those where a professional man, such as a teacher, a dentist, an advocate, by his own brains or hands earns fees, and which if taken from him would simply, in the words of Lord Justice James, constitute the bankrupt a slave to his trustee.

"But apart altogether from the light cast upon the subject by these English cases, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the word 'estate,' in the 103d section of the Scottish Bankrupt Act, never was intended to apply to anything else than some tangible property which has come to the bankrupt by succession, bequest, donation, or other means irrespective of the labour of the bankrupt himself."

¹ A B v. Sloan, June 30, 1824, 3 S. 195.

No. 165.

July 8, 1881.
Barron v.
Mitchell.

civil law.¹ The Court were entitled to make it a condition of freeing the bankrupt that he should give up his salary salvo beneficio competentie. It had never been decided in England that the portion of a bankrupt's estate which was excessive did not fall to the trustee. There was no distinction in Scotland between personal earnings and profits made in trade. The Second Division had held that a sum recovered in name of damages by an undischarged bankrupt vested in his trustee.² The salary here asked for had become due since the sequestration, and was "estate" in the sense of the Act.

The respondent argued ;—(1) The passage in Bell's Commentaries was not in favour of the petitioner's demand. It was nowhere stated that a schoolmaster's salary was arrestable. The decisions which had been quoted did not proceed upon any principle. They were cases which had occurred in cessios. That of A B v. Sloan was the only one that had occurred in a sequestration, and it was very unsatisfactorily reported. (2) A schoolmaster's salary which was not fixed, but fluctuating, being dependent partly upon the school-fees, was not "estate" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act. It had been held that a spes successionis was not "estate."³ Further, an annuity was not arrestable.⁴ In any case, personal earnings were an exception. (3) The English cases quoted by the Lord Ordinary were in point, because the English statutes were quite as comprehensive as the Scotch.⁵ (4) The salary here was in the bankrupt's possession at the time of his sequestration, and the 103d section of the Act referred only to future estate. Besides, the words "full right" meant whole right, and therefore if the trustee was entitled to any part, he was entitled to the whole estate, but it was conceded that the respondent must have a beneficium competentie, so that the section could not apply. If it did apply, then the salary was not excessive.⁶

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has found that the allegations of the petitioner are not relevant to support the application. Therefore he refuses the petition, and in that result I concur, but in doing so I have no intention of repeating or adopting the grounds of his Lordship's opinion, which he gives in his note, and which I do not think are necessary to the decision of the present question. The question is whether the petition is competent under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act. The petition is laid on that section, and the prayer is quite in accordance with the language of the section. The question is, whether the estate which is the subject of the present dispute is "estate," using the word in the wide meaning of the interpretation clause of the statute, which has been acquired by the bankrupt, or has descended, reverted, or come to him after sequestration? Now, what has vested in the bankrupt is his office of schoolmaster, and that was vested in him at the date of sequestration. Therefore, it is not estate which has been acquired by him, or has descended, reverted, or come to him after the sequestration. And what the trustee wishes to have attached are the emoluments of this office,—a subject which had vested in the

¹ Laidlaw v. Wylde, 1801, M. App. Arrestment, No. 4.

² Jackson v. M'Kechnie, Nov. 13, 1875, ante, vol. iii. 130.

³ Trappes v. Meredith, Nov. 3, 1871, 10 Macph. 38.

⁴ Smith and Others v. Innes, May 29, 1855, 17 D. 778.

⁵ Besides those in Lord Ordinary's note—Williams v. Chambers, 1845, 10 Ad. and El. 337; In re Dowling, Feb. 12, 1877, L. R. 4 Chanc. Div. 689; Acts 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 110, sec. 37, and 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 41, secs. 3 and 81.

⁶ Moinet v. Hamilton, Feb. 2, 1833, 11 S. 348.

bankrupt at the date of sequestration. On this single ground I am for refusing No. 165. the petition.

July 8, 1881.
Barron v.
Mitchell.

LORD DEAS.—I am clearly of opinion that this claim does not fall within the 103d section of the statute. The words of it cannot be repeated without seeing that this is so. This single ground disposes of the case, and I am not inclined to go into the point discussed by the Lord Ordinary in his note without necessity. The point would involve a very serious question, and until it is properly raised on its merits I do not say what my opinion on it might be.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. It is a difficult question how far salaries like the present are assignable or attachable. It is not necessary to determine that here, because this bankrupt was teacher in the school at the date of the sequestration, while the 103d section contemplates new estate only. I am quite clear therefore that the present petition is not within the 103d section.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The bankrupt was teacher at the date of the sequestration. It is not disputed that he held office ad vitam aut culpam, and had the right to draw all future emoluments. Therefore, if the trustee has any claim he has it in virtue of the sequestration, and not in virtue of the 103d section. But if he goes further he will be met, in the first place, with the difficulty dealt with by the Lord Ordinary; and, secondly, there is the consideration, whether, looking to the circumstances and position of the bankrupt, £200 a-year is an excessive amount for the maintenance of himself and his family.

THE COURT adhered.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—BOYD, MACDONALD, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

EDEN COLVILE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Kinnear—Dundas.

Mrs ISABELLA COLVILE OR MARINDIN, Defender.—J. P. B. Robertson
—Low.

No. 166.

July 12, 1881.
Colville v.
Marindin.

Process—Entail—Form of interlocutor where claimer's counsel were unable to submit argument in support of reclaiming note.—In an action for declarator that three deeds of entail were invalid, in respect that they contained no irritant clauses against altering the order of succession, the Lord Ordinary declared the deeds invalid. The defender reclaimed, but, at the hearing, her counsel stated, that, in consequence of the current of decision, they were unable to submit an argument in support of the reclaiming note. Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk), that the Court should pronounce an interlocutor to the effect that, having heard counsel for the claimer, they refused the reclaiming note and adhered.

EDEN COLVILE, of Ochiltree and Crombie, raised an action on 31st^{2D} Division. March 1881, for declarator that three several deeds of entail, under which he held his lands, dated respectively in 1727, 1819, and 1833, were invalid and ineffectual under the terms of the 43d section of the Rutherford Act, in so far as the irritant clauses were not applicable to the prohibitions against altering the order of succession to the lands. The principal substitutes, under the three deeds of entail, were called as defenders; but Mrs Isabella Colville or Marindin, the next heir, alone lodged defences.

On 9th June 1881, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—

No. 166. " Finds that the deeds of entail libelled are defective as regards the prohibition against alteration of the order of succession, in respect that there is no irritant clause applicable to said prohibition, and the same must be regarded as defective in all the prohibitions ; therefore finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the summons."

July 12, 1881.
Colville v.
Marindin.

Mrs Marindin reclaimed. At the hearing in the Inner-House, counsel for the reclaimer stated that, in the face of the series of decisions upon the subject,¹ it was impossible for them to submit an argument to the Court with the slightest hope of success, and explained that the reclaiming note had only been brought with the object of obtaining an Inner-House judgment, which, in the opinion of conveyancers, was considered of more effect than an Outer-House judgment.

LORD YOUNG.—I am averse to doing anything unusual, but in this case I am prepared to refuse this reclaiming note. It appears that these deeds of entail contain no irritant clauses directed against the alteration of the order of succession, and the law is quite settled that when that is the case the entail is invalid. The contrary was not attempted to be maintained by the reclaimer's counsel. That being the case, I think there is enough before us to entitle us to pronounce an interlocutor refusing the reclaiming note.

I quite appreciate what was stated on behalf of the reclaimer, that there is a feeling among conveyancers in Scotland that a title to an estate is safer if it depends on an Inner-House judgment rather than on an Outer-House one. I am inclined to regard that as a superstition, and would have thought that a decree in absence would have been sufficient. But when a case of this sort is brought under the notice of the Inner-House, and both parties concur in stating that clauses are wanting in these entails which are essential, I think we are in a position to pronounce a judgment. I would suggest that the proper form of interlocutor here should be a simple refusal of the reclaiming note.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I feel some difficulty in this case. If we are to be called upon to exercise our judgment judicially, we are certainly entitled to all the assistance which can be afforded us. But probably counsel for the reclaimer have done enough when they have stated that it is impossible for them successfully to adduce an argument in the face of the decisions. It therefore appears to me that all we require to do here is to pronounce an interlocutor to the effect that, having heard counsel for the reclaimer, we refuse the reclaiming note.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My view is entirely different. I cannot say that I am judicially satisfied as to this case. Nothing has been argued to us, and in such circumstances I decline to pronounce a judgment. It is not the business of the Court to examine deeds or pronounce on propositions which are not contentious.

I am inclined to be of opinion that we should pronounce an interlocutor in these terms,—“In respect that counsel for the reclaimer submitted no argument, adhere.” As however your Lordships think differently, the interlocutor will be :—“Having heard counsel for the defender on her reclaiming note against ¹ Authorities.—Dick Cunyngham v. Dick Cunyngham, March 9, 1852, 14 D. 636, 24 Scot. Jur. 323 ; Dewar v. Dewar, July 20, 1852, 14 D. 1062, 24 Scot. Jur. 661 ; Ferguson v. Ferguson, November 18, 1852, 15 D. 19, 25 Scot. Jur. 21 ; Hamilton v. Hamilton, April 29, 1870, 8 Macph. H. L. 48, 42 Scot. Jur. 396.

Lord Curriehill's interlocutor of 9th June 1881, refuse the reclaiming note, No. 166. and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern."

July 12, 1881.
Colville v.
Marindin.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the defender on her reclaiming note against Lord Curriehill's interlocutor of 9th June 1881, refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern."

MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

MARGARET FERGUSON OR MARSHALL, Applicant.—Sym.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—C. S. Dickson.

No. 167.

July 13, 1881.
Marshall v.
North British Railway Co.

Poor-roll—Admission where the reporters on the probablis causa litigandi are equally divided in opinion—A. S. 21st November 1842, sec. 1.—Where the reporters on the probablis causa litigandi reported to the Court that two of them were of opinion that an applicant had, and that two of them were of opinion that she had not a probablis causa, the Court (diss. Lord Shand) admitted the applicant.

MRS MARGARET FERGUSON OR MARSHALL applied for the benefit of the poor-roll to enable her to carry on an action of damages against the North British Railway Company. 1st DIVISION.
B.

The application was remitted to the reporters on the probablis causa litigandi, who, after hearing the agent and counsel for the parties, reported:—"We are equally divided in opinion as to the probablis causa litigandi of this applicant,—Mr Readman, advocate, and Mr Lindsay, W.S., being of opinion that the applicant has not, while Mr Macfarlane, advocate, and Mr Rennie, S.S.C., are of opinion that the applicant has a probablis causa litigandi, and we respectfully crave your Lordships to dispose of the remit in the circumstances; and we beg respectfully to refer your Lordships to Mr Mackay's treatise on the practice of the Court of Session, vol. i, p. 337, par. 5, in which an unreported case is cited where a division of opinion similar to the present occurred among the reporters, and in respect thereof the Court admitted the applicant."

The North British Railway Company objected to the admission of the applicant, on the ground that she had not obtained a favourable report, and moved the Court to appoint special reporters to deal with the case.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Act of Sederunt of 21st November 1842, in its first section, provides—"That the Faculty of Advocates, the Writers to the Signet, and Solicitors before the Supreme Courts, besides electing counsel and agents for conducting the causes of the poor as at present, shall also respectively name two advocates, one writer to the signet, and one solicitor each year, to act exclusively as reporters on the probablis causa of the pauper applicants for the benefit of the poor-roll; the lists to be furnished to the senior principal Clerk of Session of each Division of the Court, and also to the Keeper of the Minute-book, in order to be printed and published on the meeting of the Court in January yearly, and headed 'List of Lawyers and Agents for the poor, 1843,' and so on yearly." Now, that arrangement was made with these bodies of practitioners after a careful consideration of the subject, in order to remedy an

¹ Clark v. Campbell, July 6, 1833, 11 S. 908; M'Callum, June 26, 1841, 3 D. 1102; Rutherford, July 20, 1855, 17 D. 1140.

No. 167. existing evil arising from the great laxity in the mode of admission to the poor-roll. I had a good deal to do personally with the framing of that Act of Sederunt, and I know that it was the intention of the Court that nobody should be allowed to act as a reporter on the probabilis causa except the persons named by the Faculty of Advocates, the Writers to the Signet, and the Society of Solicitors. I should consequently be very slow indeed to resort to the remedy of remitting to persons not named by these bodies. The question therefore is, whether where there is an equal division of opinion among the gentlemen to whom alone this business is entrusted, the result ought to be to exclude or to admit the applicant to the benefit of the roll? On this point I have not much difficulty. If there is so much doubt in the particular case as to lead to two of the reporters to be in favour of admitting the applicant, I have little hesitation in following the case mentioned in Mr Mackay's book. I am for granting the application.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I cannot agree with your Lordships that this Court has not power to remit to other persons than those appointed under the Act of Sederunt of 1842. It is true that the Act of Sederunt says that these gentlemen are "to act exclusively as reporters on the probabilis causa," but I cannot doubt, notwithstanding this provision, that the Court has the power to remit to any other person whenever it seems necessary to do so. I think therefore that we should have acceded to the motion of the respondents to remit to an independent third party.

As to whether a probabilis causa has in the present case been made out, if it is a decided point that an equality of division among the reporters is sufficient evidence of a probabilis causa, there is an end of the matter; but if the point is still an open one, then I must say that I differ from your Lordships. The onus upon the applicant is to shew that he has probable cause of success, and I do not think that he has done so when the reporters are equally divided. It is not enough to shew that he has a fair chance of success; I think he must have a preponderating chance. I therefore must be against admitting the applicant.

THE COURT admitted the applicant.

D. CUTHBERT, S.S.C.—ADAM JOHNSTON, Solicitor.—Agents.

No. 168. Mrs MARGARET POLLOK or WHYTE, Pursuer.—D.-F. Kinnear—Low—Graham Murray.
 July 13, 1881. Mrs JANE M'NISH WHYTE or HAMILTON, Defender.—Dickson.
 Whyte v. JAMES FRANCIS WATSON and OTHERS, Defenders.—Guthrie Smith—Mackay.
 Hamilton, &c.

Succession—Testament—Holograph Will headed "Notes of intended Settlement."—In the repositories of a person who died leaving no other testamentary writing, the following holograph document was found bearing a date seven years before his death :—

"Bankhead, 19 June
1873

"Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead.
 first—I liferent my wife Mrs. Margaret Pollok or Whyte, in my whole estate both Heritable & Moveable burdened with an Annuity of £300 Stg Three hundred pounds Sterling a year to," &c. After various bequests expressed in the same full and careful manner, the writer's signature was appended. No. 168.

After a parole proof as to the circumstances, held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that the document was effectual as a testamentary writing of the deceased. July 13, 1881. Whyte v. Hamilton, &c.

WALTER WHYTE of Bankhead died on 16th September 1880, at the age of sixty-seven. 2D DIVISION Lord Fraser. M.

On 9th December 1880 his widow, Mrs Margaret Pollok or Whyte, raised this action in the Court of Session, concluding for declarator that the writing after mentioned was the last will and settlement of her late husband. The writing referred to bore:—

" Bankhead 19 June
" 1873

" Notes of intended Settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead.

" first—I liferent my wife Mrs. Margaret Pollok or Whyte, in my whole estate both Heritable & Moveable burdened with an Annuity of £300 Stg Three Hundred pounds Sterling a year to my Sister Mrs Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton Widow of the late James Hamilton Writer in Glasgow should my wife survive me—at the death of my Wife said Annuity to cease, In place thereof I leave to my said Sister Mrs Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton in liferent only and to my nephew John Hamilton Writer in Glasgow in fee my pro indiviso half of the lands of Kenmuir situated in the parish of Old Monkland & County of Lanark, likewise my pro indiviso half of the lands of Shettleston situated in the Barony parish of Glasgow & said County of Lanark—To my nephew James Hamilton I leave my lands of Cuthill & Newmill of Brieich &c situated in the parish of Whitburn & County of Linlithgow subject to the liferent of his mother the said Mrs. Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton I also leave to my nephew James Frances Watson presently residing at Ardmore house in the Parish of Caddross Dumbartonshire, my Estate of Bankhead situated in the parish of Rutherglen and County of Lanark, but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said Nephew James Frances Watson dieing without leaving any lawful mail heir of his body—Then & in that event my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my said nephew John Hamilton, my Moveable Estate at the death of my said wife is to be equally divided between the families of my two sisters Mrs Frances Killian Whyte or Watson now deceased and the said Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton excluding (excluding) the Males in each of said families—I also exclude the Jus mariti of their present or any future husbands And as regards my two Nieces Anna Maria Watson or Ewing, and Margaret Buchanan Watson or Ellis, their respective shares are to be handed over to their Marriage Contract Trustees, to be invested by them for the sole behoof of my said two Nieces, Anna Maria Watson or Ewing and Margaret Buchanan Watson or Ellis to be altogether quite exclusive of the Jus Mariti of their present or future husbands I also leave a legacy of £500 Stg Five hundred pounds Stg to my Nephew Walter Whyte Hamilton, said legacy to be paid him by my said Nephew John Hamilton from the lands of Kenmuir & Shettleston upon his succeeding to them at the death of his Mother Mrs Jane Macknish Whyte or Hamilton—I likewise leave the sum of One Hundred pounds Sterling to the Royal Infirmary in Glasgow to be paid free of Legacy duty.

" WALTER WHYTE."

The heirs-at-law, representatives in moveables, and the executrix-dative of Mr Whyte, were called as defenders, and all appeared in the action. The condescendence, after narrating Mr Whyte's death, &c., continued,—(Cond. 3) " After Mr Whyte's funeral on the 20th of September his re-

No. 168. July 18, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

positories were opened and searched by the law-agents acting for the different persons interested in his estate, and there was found in a portable desk which he had in daily use, and which stood on a sideboard in his parlour, a holograph and signed document by him in the following terms:—‘Bankhead, 19th June 1873,’” supra. (Cond. 4) “The said document consists of a single sheet of ordinary letter-paper, and it was found lying flat in the desk, with no appearance of ever having been folded, and it had no written backing upon it. No other settlement or writing of a testamentary nature by Mr Whyte has been found.” (Cond. 5) “The pursuer believes and avers that the signature to the said document was not appended thereto at the time of the document being written, but was done by Mr Whyte on a day about the beginning of August last, when he was engaged in arranging his papers, or at least on a day subsequent to the said 19th day of June 1873.” (Cond. 6) “The late Mr Whyte never consulted any lawyer as to the preparation of any will or settlement, and on various occasions, and to different persons, he spoke as if his affairs were regulated by some deed which should be operative as a will.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The document or writing condescended on being of a testamentary character, must receive effect as the last will and settlement of the late Walter Whyte, and regulate his succession.

The defenders denied the statements in condescendence 5 and 6; and with regard to the averment as to the nature of the document and the repository in which it was found, they stated that it was merely a jotting of proposed notes, and not a testamentary writing, and that it was found among current bank-books and loose accounts and papers, but no documents of importance were near it.

They pleaded;—(1) The document in question is not, upon its just construction, a valid testamentary writing, or entitled to receive effect as such.

On 23d February the Lord Ordinary allowed both parties a proof of their respective averments,* which was afterwards led.

* His Lordship added this note,—“The Lord Ordinary is not prepared to turn this action out of Court on the ground maintained by the defenders, viz, that there is enough set forth in the document founded on by the pursuers to indicate that it is not a will. Documents more indicative of inchoate intention than this one have not, in other cases, been so summarily dealt with. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that inquiry ought to be made as to the averments contained in the 5th and 6th articles of the condescendence, and also as to the averments by the defenders in answer to the 3d article; and such inquiry is in accordance with the usual practice of the Court where informal documents are propounded as wills. Either the facts connected with the time of writing the paper and of signing it, the place where it was found, and the verbal declarations of the writer in regard to it, were all ascertained by proof, or by admissions in special cases presented for the opinion of the Court, or probation was renounced before judgment was given, and the facts connected with these matters were held to be relevant and material in judgment, whether the document was to be considered as a will.

“Thus, in the leading case of Munro v. Coutts (1 Dow, 437), correspondence between the testator and his agents was admitted for this purpose, and the House of Lords thought that the Court of Session should have gone further, and admitted parole evidence. Lord Eldon expressed himself thus:—‘The written correspondence on this subject had been admitted as evidence, and he thought properly admitted, as the paper was of a doubtful and ambiguous character, and required explanation; but they should have gone further. Upon what principle did they not let in such parole testimony as that of M’Intosh and George Munro, as to the conversation that took place?’ In the case of Scott v. Sceales 24th Feb. 1864, 2 Macph. 613), the Court, ex proprio motu, appointed an exami-

The Lord Ordinary in deciding the case (on 21st May 1881) gave the following summary of the more important parts of the evidence in his note :—
 “ Mr Whyte was a landed proprietor, who had no profession or business to occupy his attention. Like most people in Lanarkshire, he went to Glasgow on the Wednesdays without having any particular business to do. There he, upon each of these occasions (and this is important), saw his brother-in-law, Mr Walter Pollok, a writer in Glasgow, to whom he never gave any instructions for the preparation of a will. In his own home he occupied himself with the management of his property. The proof discloses nothing about the rooms in his house, with the exception of three. He had in his bedroom a bureau, in which was found the money that he left at his death, and the deposit-receipts for money in bank. Off this room there was another, in which there was the charter-box containing his title-deeds and other valuable documents. There was, thirdly, a parlour in the lower storey, in which there was a writing-desk, which usually rested upon the sideboard. In this parlour Mr Whyte wrote all his letters upon this desk, the key of which he carefully retained in his own possession.

July 13, 1881
 Whyte v.
 Hamilton, &c.

“ Upon the day of his funeral, his brother-in-law Mr Pollok, his nephew Mr John A. Hamilton, and his friend Mr John M. Hill, examined his repositories. They found no writing in the bureau in the bedroom, nor in the charter-box, of a testamentary character. But in the desk they found the document which is now propounded as a will. It was lying flat in the bottom of a compartment in this desk amidst miscellaneous documents, and along with Mr Whyte's cash-books.”

Evidence as to the state of Mr Whyte's health, and as to the alleged nation to be made of the testator's agent ‘as to all matters of fact bearing on the question, what are the testamentary papers of the deceased?’ In Lowson v. Ford (20th March 1866, 4 Macph. 631), the parties adjusted a joint minute, setting forth the facts which they thought material, and renounced further probation, but the Court were not satisfied with the information so given, and pronounced an interlocutor allowing proof of all facts bearing on the question, ‘what are the testamentary papers of the testator?’ The facts in the case of Cunningham v. Murray's Trustees (15th March 1871, 9 Macph. 713) were set forth in a special case, as they were likewise in the case of Forsyth v. Forsyth (13th March 1872, 10 Macph. 616).

“ The practice thus established by these decisions is in accordance also with that followed in the Probate Court in England, and is well illustrated by a decision upon a document very similar in its terms to that founded upon in the present action. It began thus,—‘This is a memorandum of my intended will.’ But, said Sir John Nicholl, ‘it goes on throughout in dispositive terms; it appoints executors, is dated and signed by the deceased himself, and the character of the signature is different from that of the body of the instrument. Still, the term “memorandum of my intended will” would raise a sufficient doubt to let in evidence of circumstances, whether it was finished in order to have effect, or only as a deliberative memorandum. Parole evidence, then, being let in, the history of the deceased and of this paper may give to his intentions a more decided character.’—(Barwick v. Mullings, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 225). Other cases to the same effect, which begin with such words as these,—‘heads of will,’ ‘a plan to be afterwards drawn out,’ are mentioned and commented upon in Williams on Executors, vol. i. p. 360.

“ The Lord Ordinary expresses no opinion at this stage of the case upon the merits, but looking to the opinions of the Lord President and Lord Kinloch in the case of Forsyth, the averment in the 5th article of the condescendence becomes very material. If the signature was appended at a date subsequent to the writing of the body of the document, this perhaps may be indicated by a difference in the character of the handwriting or of the ink. The document should be exhibited at the proof.”

No. 168. signing of the document, was given by a Miss Jamieson, a niece of the pursuer, as follows :—" I am 34 years old. I live at Bankhead. I am a niece of Mrs Whyte. I went to live with her in 1878. My uncle was in bad health at the time, and had an operation for a growth on his leg. It was so far successful, but about a year after there was a second operation, and he gradually sank afterwards. I often saw him looking through his papers. I remember seeing him do so on an occasion in August 1880. They were in his desk in the parlour. He often carried papers from his bedroom upstairs down to the parlour. He kept some of his papers in the bureau in his bedroom. On the occasion in August 1880 I saw him come downstairs with a sheet of paper ; I was going into the same room, and I saw him open his desk and lay the paper on it, and he seemed to write something on the paper. It seemed to be a sheet of letter-paper. I have not seen the document now in question. (Shewn 'Notes of intended settlement,' exhibited by Mr Balfour of the Register House)—The sheet of paper deceased had on that occasion was similar in appearance to this. The desk stood on the sideboard in the parlour downstairs. The parlour was used as a breakfast-room. It was not much used during the day. Deceased always wrote his letters in that room. The desk was invariably kept locked, and he always kept the key ; it was never out of his possession." Cross for Watson, &c.—"On the occasion in August spoken to I met my uncle at the foot of the stairs, and he walked into the parlour before me. I was going into the parlour to see after some house duties ; I had some lamps to look after. My uncle was in the habit of going up and down stairs. I was in the habit of going out and in to the parlour. He did not say anything to me on that occasion. I was in the parlour for about ten minutes, and then I left. He stood at his desk. He did not sit down till he closed the desk and left it. The desk was at the left-hand side of the sideboard. When he closed the desk he sat down in the parlour. He did not speak to me at all on that occasion. That was the desk that he wrote all his letters at. He was at the desk every day. He kept his writing-paper and envelopes in it, also his paid accounts. (Q.) Where did you understand that he kept his valuable documents ? (A.) In that desk. (Q.) Only ? (A.) There were some of them found in the bureau in his bedroom. I did not know much about that till after his death. I knew the bureau was upstairs, but I did not know what was kept in it. He kept his money in the bureau, but I did not know that till after his death. I knew he had a tin box, but I did not know what was in it. I never saw into it. After the repositories had been searched by the men of business I found in the bureau a number of deposit-receipts. I gave them all to Mr Pollok. My aunt looked and saw that some certificates for stock which deceased held were among the deposit-receipts. I found them all in a secret drawer of the bureau." By the Court.—"On the occasion when my uncle went with the paper into the parlour I saw him unlock the desk. He had the paper in his hand. He seemed to write something on the paper, leaning his arm on the desk. The desk was open. I saw him open it and write something. He wrote for a very short time. (Q.) Did he write longer than it would take to write his signature ? (A.) No. He then put the paper into the desk, and closed the desk. He said nothing to me. He had not been writing that morning before. This was between eleven and twelve o'clock. It was about the beginning of August, but I cannot tell the particular day. He had undergone an operation before that, but was better then. I left him sitting in the parlour, reading the papers. He never spoke to me about his will. I never saw him writing upstairs at the bureau."

July 13, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

Mr Pollok, writer, Glasgow, the brother-in-law of the deceased, de- No. 168.
 poned,—“I was constantly in deceased’s house when he was alive. He never spoke to me about making a will, but on one occasion he asked me July 13, 1881.
 if he could increase his wife’s annuity under the marriage-contract. Whyte v.
 had written that contract, and on one of his Wednesday calls upon me Hamilton, &c. he said,—‘I suppose I can increase Maggie’s annuity?’ I said he could neither increase nor diminish that annuity, but he could give her an additional annuity. He replied ‘Ay,’ and said no more. He did not tell me to make out a deed, and I did not like to volunteer it. . . . ‘I think the conversation between deceased and myself about his wife’s annuity took place some time during the year 1877.’”

On 21st May 1881 the Lord Ordinary found “that the writing dated 19th June 1873, and registered in the Books of Council and Session the 22d September 1880, entitled ‘Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead,’ is not the last will and settlement of the said deceased Walter Whyte, and cannot receive effect as such: Assolizies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses.”*

* “NOTE.—It is with reluctance, and somewhat with regret, that the Lord Ordinary feels himself constrained to pronounce the foregoing interlocutor. He is satisfied that Mr Whyte intended very largely to increase the provision in favour of his widow. But the dead hand has not in this case executed his purpose effectively. . . .

“The question now is, whether this document can be treated as a will. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it cannot. In its favour there are the following circumstances:—First, that it is proved that Mr Whyte intended to increase the provisions in favour of his widow; and he did so by the document in question, by giving to her the liferent of his whole estate under the burdens therein mentioned. Secondly, that the language of the will is dispositive and absolute. Thirdly, it is carefully written out, and must have been copied from a draft which he had made, and this is indicated very strongly by the way in which he writes the word ‘excluding.’ Not being satisfied with it as first written, he attempts to correct the writing, and then repeats the word, indicating thereby his determination to make the matter quite clear and distinct; and Fourthly, he signs this document.

“There can be no doubt whatever that if this document had stood alone, without its title, it would have been a perfectly valid will and settlement of Mr Whyte’s estates. But the following are the grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary considers that it cannot be accepted as such:—1st, The date of the document is 19th June 1873, and the title is, ‘Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead.’ These words indicate simply this, that they were merely jottings, put down by Mr Whyte as of a settlement which he intended to make. The Lord Ordinary has endeavoured to read the title in this way—‘I intend my property to be disposed of as follows,’ or ‘This is my intention about the settlement of my property.’ But with every desire to give effect to an apparently rational settlement, he is unable to come to this conclusion.
 Because, 2dly, in the year 1877 Mr Whyte asked his brother-in-law, Mr Pollok, whether he could increase the annuity to his wife. Now, if he in the year 1873 had made a will of the whole liferent of his estate to his wife, this was a very odd question. It must be deduced from the fact of his putting such a question that he had forgot entirely what he had done in 1873, and that his ‘Notes of an intended settlement’ were never meant by him to be anything more than notes, which he might carry into effect at some time or other when he had fully made up his mind upon the subject,—by asking his brother-in-law or his nephew to prepare a settlement in accordance therewith, which he never did. 3dly, This is not a case where the document is first written out, and then, after an interval, the signature is appended. If this state of the facts existed, it might justly be concluded that what was first intention had been carried into

No. 168.

July 13, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

Mrs Whyte reclaimed, and argued ;—The document here was holograph, dated and signed, and contained dispositive words. There was also no trace of any other document of a testamentary nature in the deceased's repositories. In such a case, if the document were rejected as not testamentary, then the result would be intestacy. Where intestacy would be the result of rejection informal writings had always been favoured. The only objection which could be stated to the writing was derived from its heading. But the facts that it was dated and signed were strong indications that the writing was intended to be final.¹ The prima facie inference is that such a writing as this was intended to be operative, and in that case the onus fell on the objector to prove to the contrary.² Cases of drafts of codicils and instructions to agents which were never carried out, especially when they came into competition with formal prior writings,³ belonged to quite a different category from this. "Notes of intended settlement" were in act, and had become a positive bequest. Some attempt to prove a case of this kind was made on behalf of the pursuer, but it was unsuccessful. On a day in the month of August 1880, one month before Mr Whyte died, it is proved by Miss Jamieson that Mr Whyte came downstairs with a sheet of paper in his hand similar to that now propounded as his will ; that he took it to the side-board on which his desk lay ; that he wrote something upon that sheet of paper and put it into his desk, and that what he wrote would not occupy more time than would be necessary for his signature. It is suggested that he then and there brought the document in question from upstairs to the parlour, and then and there adhibited to it his signature in the parlour, in 1880, the body of the document having been written in 1873. The Lord Ordinary entirely rejects this suggestion. The same pen which wrote the body of the document in 1873 wrote at the very same time the signature appended thereto ; and it must have been some different document altogether upon which Miss Jamieson saw Mr Whyte write on the occasion to which she speaks. Lastly, the place in which the document was found cannot be overlooked as an element in the case. The alleged will professed to dispose of the whole of the estate ; and one would naturally suppose that if it was intended to have this effect it would be found in the bureau in which he had put away the deposit-receipts and where he kept his money, or in the charter-chest where he kept his titles and bonds. But it was not so. The paper is found in a desk, containing, no doubt, cash-books in daily use, but also the ordinary loose papers commonly seen in a man's writing-desk,—drafts of letters, jottings, papers containing writing and papers without any, envelopes ; in short, the alleged will had very bad company, and its character must be judged of very much according to that of the company it had. The conversation with Mr Pollok about increasing his wife's annuity in the year 1877, in truth, shews that Mr Whyte had forgotten altogether 'the notes of intended settlement,' which was lying under a heap of miscellaneous papers in his writing-desk. The cases of Forsyth and Cunningham, referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note to the interlocutor of 23d February 1881, indicate that in circumstances such as occur in the present case the use of peremptory, absolute, and dispositive words, and the signing the name to notes and jottings, are unavailing against evidence that the writer did not intend these papers to be the expression of his final will ; and there is such evidence here. The expenses of this process must be borne by the estate of Mr Whyte, he himself having caused a litigation on the subject by leaving such a document in his repositories."

¹ Lowson v. Ford, March 20, 1866, 4 Macph. 631 (Lord Benholme, p. 640), 38 Scot. Jur. 325.

² Mitchell v. Mitchell, 1828, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Ca. 74 ; Barwick v. Mullings, Jan. 14, 1829, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Ca. 225.

³ Munro v. Coutts, July 3, 1813, 1 Dow, 437 ; Forsyth's Trustees v. Forsyth, March 13, 1872, 10 Macph. 616, 44 Scot. Jur. 353 ; Aim's Trustee v. Aim, Dec. 15, 1880, supra, p. 294.

much more favourable position than these other writings, and must be held to be operative until superseded by a more formal writing,¹ which in this case they could not now be.

No. 168.
July 13, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

Argued for Mr Hamilton and others ;—The attempt to make out that the document had been signed shortly before Mr Whyte's death had failed, and it must be held to have been signed at the date it bore. The place in which it was found was not a repository of the nature in which such writings as had been sustained were usually found. It was an ordinary writing-desk, and the writing was not along with valuable securities or documents, as was usual in such cases. Its heading indicated that it was not a final document, and headings were held to control all such writings.² The fact that this writing was never sent to be put in shape by a law-agent shewed that it did not contain the deceased's final intentions, and put it in a worse position than writings which had been sent to be put in shape but had never been executed.³ In order to support the finality and operativeness of such a writing, which bore only to express the present intention of a deceased, much stronger parole evidence was required than had been here adduced.⁴

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think the Lord Ordinary was entirely right in allowing parties to lead evidence in regard to the circumstances bearing on the testamentary character of the writing in question, and I adopt the reasoning contained in his note to his interlocutor of the 23d February 1881. Such is now the established practice of our own Courts and of those of England, at least until the recent Wills Act, when writings more or less informal and ambiguous are propounded as containing the expressions of the testamentary intentions of a deceased.

The remaining question which we have now to decide is one not so much of legal construction as of fact or of inference from fact. Are we to infer from the writing founded on, and the surrounding circumstances, that the deceased Mr Whyte intended that it should regulate his succession, or was it merely a memorandum made for his own guidance, which he might or might not afterwards give effect to by a formally executed testament?

The document speaks for itself. The surrounding circumstances are very accurately and fairly summarised by the Lord Ordinary in his note, and I need not examine them at length.

It is not without hesitation that I differ from the Lord Ordinary on such a question, and it is one of difficulty as well as of interest. But I have come to a different conclusion. I think, on a balance of the elements of proof in this case, that Mr Whyte intended this writing to regulate the succession to his property after his death. I do so for the following reasons :—

1. The writing itself in its substance is a completed settlement. It is the work of a man with some knowledge of legal phraseology, is evidently carefully

¹ Hattat v. Hattat, 1832, 4 Hagg. Eccl. Ca. 211.

² Stainton v. Stainton, Jan. 17, 1828, 6 Sh. 363; Cunningham v. Murray's Trustees, March 15, 1871, 9 Macph. 813, 43 Scot. Jur. 362; Lindsay v. Lindsay, April 18, 1872, L. R. 2 Prob. and Div. 459.

³ Vide cases, supra, p. 946, note 3.

⁴ Mathews v. Warner, Nov. 22, 1798, 4 Vesey, 186; Hattat v. Hattat, supra, note 1; Coppin v. Dillon, 1833, 4 Hagg. Eccl. Ca., 361; Williams on Executors, vol. i., 360.

No. 168. extended from a draft, written in a fair and distinct hand, very clearly expressed in appropriate language, and signed by the writer. The deceased plainly knew how to make an effectual testamentary writing, and so far as the framework of this instrument is concerned it leaves no room for criticism.

July 13, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

But, no doubt, it has a heading or superscription, in which it is entitled—"Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead." The question is, whether this title reduces this very careful composition from an expression of present testamentary intention, which its terms import, to the level of a mere memorandum of what he thought he might possibly do at some future time.

Taking the writing and its title together and alone I cannot come to that conclusion. These might be notes of his testamentary intentions, in the sense that they should only operate if he did not embody them in a regular and extended deed. But the real question is, Were they notes, the expression of a testamentary intention, or merely notes to help him if he ever came to execute a testament? I cannot reconcile this last assumption with the careful terms and the signature of the instrument itself. Prima facie, at all events, the presumption is that a man who executes a settlement means it to take effect, and I do not think that the title of this paper overcomes this presumption. Had the terms of it been less precise, the signature of it might not have been conclusive, but the signature of a document expressive of a clear and deliberate testamentary intention in the body of it is what we should expect from its substance, and a very weighty element in this question.

2. The surrounding circumstances are few, but I think all of them lead to the same result. First, this man had made no other settlement. I think this important, both in itself and with reference to some of the other cases which were cited to us. If it were propounded as a mere codicil to a regular settlement it might be inferred that the deceased would naturally execute one part of his testamentary writings as he had executed others. But he had made no other will, and it is hardly to be thought that he meant to die intestate. When he wrote this he certainly did not intend to do so. He died after a prolonged illness, but shewed no anxiety about his affairs. Secondly, this will carries out what from his conversation with his law adviser we know was in his mind, and what for a childless husband was in all respects natural. He wished to increase the provision for his wife, and so Mr Pollok tells us. I draw from the conversation in question an inference the reverse of that drawn by the Lord Ordinary. He thinks that it shews that the deceased had forgotten the writing in 1873. I think it shews that he remembered it very well, and merely wished to ascertain indirectly whether it was within his powers. There might be reasons in his own mind for not divulging his intentions to anyone—not even to his law adviser.

I give no weight to the "bad company" in which the Lord Ordinary says this writing was found. The place in which it was found was his private desk; it was lockfast; he kept the key himself; and where his cash-books were was sufficiently private I should think for his will.

Many cases of this class have occurred both with us and in England, but they are all cases of circumstances. This one I think the strongest in support of the writing which I have seen. That which comes nearest to it of those cited is the case of Hattat, 4 Haggart, 211, in which the writing was sustained as a will although bearing a superscription not dissimilar from the present, and the views expressed by Sir John Nicholl in the case of Barwick tend in the same direction, although there was a subsequent attempt to make a different settlement. The document in the case of Forsyth was unfinished, and that in the case of Cunningham did not bear to be a testament. I can find no reason to suppose that Mr Whyte meant to die intestate, and, on the whole, I am satisfied that he all along relied on what he had done to prevent that result.

No. 168.

July 13, 1881.

Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur, and I must own that I do so without any hesitancy. Indeed, from the time that I understood the case I did not regard it as attended with any material difficulty. The Lord Ordinary says, and says I think soundly, that there can be no doubt whatever that if this document had stood alone without its title it would have been a perfectly valid will and settlement of Mr Whyte's estates. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship in thinking that its title raises or suggests sufficient room for doubt to admit of parole evidence as to the circumstances in which the document was found, including, of course, the place where it was found. But for the heading, which alone creates any doubt, without which there would have been no doubt that this was a valid settlement, parole evidence would have been incompetent,—not admissible in the case at all—assuming always that the will was not impeached upon any ground valid in law. Evidence would have been inadmissible, as in the case of any other proper writing expressive of a man's intentions. But the heading just creates sufficient ambiguity to make parole evidence of the whole surrounding circumstances admissible. Now, I entirely agree with your Lordship that in that parole evidence there is nothing at all to confirm the doubt, but everything to dissipate it. To begin with, I think the doubt a very slender one. The heading here is—"Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte." If it had been "Notes of settlement by Walter Whyte" there would have been no doubt at all; or if it had been "Intended settlement by Walter Whyte" there would have been no doubt at all. Now, the doubt is scarcely more than visible when you join these words together, "Notes of intended settlement." The alternative here,—and I concur with your Lordship in thinking that that is important,—is not between this and some other document expressive of his will, but between this, which is the only expression of his will, and the legal rules of succession.

These operate as the presumed will of the deceased where he says nothing to the contrary. That is the theory of the matter. But this gentleman has left us notes of his intention to the contrary. We are to take note of that. That is really the meaning of it. He has left us notes for our guidance as to his will regarding the disposal of his estate after his death; and I do not at all read the word "intended" as expressive of an intention to do something in the future. It is what he means to be done with his estate after he ceases to be capable of doing anything. I do not read it as equivalent to this,—“I intend to make a settlement of my estate in the following terms.” That would be almost ridiculous. A man does not note with a heading his intention to himself,—“You take note that you intend to do so and so at a future time.” That is not the meaning of it. It is a note of his intention for the information of others. Now, one is not put to ingenious conjectures—of which there is no end—as to possible circumstances attending the place and the finding of this document, which might have induced us to throw it aside as not a satisfactory expression of the testator's will. It is sufficient to say that there is nothing here to induce us to do that. It is found in the desk, of which he kept the key, and to which he was in the habit almost daily of resorting,—a very natural place for a document expressive of his

No. 168. intention to be found. I do not think it necessary to dwell further upon the matter. The evidence having been admitted—and I think properly admitted—the question truly in my view is one of fact. The law is exhausted when we say that the heading renders evidence admissible to see whether it dissipates or confirms the doubt assumed prima facie to exist. But the evidence being admitted, the question is one of fact, although as it has to be determined by the impression which is made upon a bench of Judges, there is always more or less uncertainty about it; for different men will have different impressions as to such matters. But, in point of fact here, concurring with your Lordship, I think there is nothing in the evidence to confirm, but, on the contrary, that there is sufficient to dissipate any little doubt that existed to begin with.

July 13, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur with both your Lordships in all that you have said in explanation of the grounds of judgment. The case is one of interest; and as the Lord Ordinary has adopted a different view from that at which we have arrived it cannot be regarded as a case free from difficulty. At the same time, the conclusion which I have reached is one that I have adopted in the end without any hesitation. There is no doubt whatever that the Lord Ordinary, when he allowed a proof of that which was set forth on record, acted with the greatest propriety, and according to precedent, because the writing as a whole did give such an indication of ambiguity as rendered it necessary, or at least in the highest degree expedient, that recourse should be had to the surrounding circumstances for the purpose of obtaining—if it could be got—additional information relative to matters which presumably would throw further light upon the intention of the supposed testator. That evidence having been taken, I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the result over all is that it is not only disproved that the testator did not intend that this paper should be an operative will, but that it is plain that he did intend that such should be taken to be its character. The paper itself was found in a place where certainly the will of the testator Mr Whyte might have been expected to be found; indeed, it was one of those repositories in which naturally his settlement might have been placed; for, to say the least of it, I think that a locked desk, the key of which was retained by himself, was as natural a place as any other in which any paper of this kind might be deposited. I do not say that this goes very far, because even if the document in question were to be regarded as having been written by himself, not as a final expression of his will, but as a paper that might afterwards come to be used in the course of the preparation of his will, it is not only conceivable, but it is extremely likely that this place, or a similar place, would have been the repository in which it would have been placed. Now, what appears to me, considering everything which has been adduced, to be the conclusion in this case is this, that the testator, intending to make a will, made this writing as his will, by which he intended that the succession to his property should be regulated. There are but three things, apparently, one or other of which this writing must be taken to be: it must be taken to be his will, meaning the will by which he intended his affairs to be regulated after his death, or it was a paper from which another will was to be copied, or, last of all, it was a paper of instructions to be communicated to some one by whom the will was to be prepared. Now, with reference to the second of these, it seems to me impossible to reconcile the language and the anxiety exhibited in the preparation of this will with the preparation of mere notes or the preparation of a mere copy, which was afterwards No. 168.

to be used in the preparation of a more formal deed. A more formal deed could hardly, indeed, have been framed. And what is remarkable is this, that if we July 13, 1881.
are to use the word "notes," as it is sometimes used, as a short expression for Whyte v.
that which was afterwards to be set forth at greater length, it is not possible that Hamilton, &c.
that can be the signification here, because everything which is mentioned in the writing itself as of a testamentary character is absolutely expressed at full length. Nay, more, when you come to the mention of sums, such is the anxiety exhibited by the writer of this instrument that he is not content with specifying the sum in figures, but he writes out at full length the same sum in words.
It is hardly conceivable that a paper which was prepared with such anxiety could be intended merely either as a short statement of that which was afterwards to be lengthened, or as instructions which were to be communicated to some one by whom another deed was to be prepared. And I think even this heading, from which the difficulty has originated, seems to suggest, at least, that he did not introduce it for the purpose of indicating that what he was about to do was simply to make notes or a synopsis of something that might be afterwards lengthened, or to set down instructions which might hereafter be communicated that some one else might prepare a deed. His description of it is,
"Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte." Now, that could not be for his own information; and I do not think it could have been put down for the information of anyone to whom instructions were to be communicated.
That is not the way in which they would have been communicated. But I think these words, describing himself at full length, as he afterwards describes the intended beneficiaries at full length, shew that this which he was performing was the preparation, as it was afterwards to be the completion, of the testamentary writing from which all in the end would learn who he was, what he intended to do, and who were the beneficiaries who, if his intentions were carried out, would be benefited. And so, coming to that conclusion upon the face of the instrument, and agreeing as I do with the observations that have been made,
I do not think that this heading or this superscription suggests so great a difficulty as that which has been found to occur in other cases, because if he had said, "this is my intended settlement," that surely would not have been held to indicate that what he did was not to be operative, or that he intended it merely as a notandum of something that was to be done at a future time. I think that this is neither more nor less than simply the expression of an intention that what he then wrote was the will or settlement by which he intended that his affairs should be governed. It is quite true that it was unnecessary that that should have been stated. The statement of it, indeed, looking to the formality with which other parts of the deed are executed, could not have been expected; but after it was stated, it does not seem to me, fairly and reasonably interpreted, to derogate in the least from the effect which appears to me to be due to the other parts of the writing. The writing is carefully prepared, the greatest possible anxiety is exhibited in the expression of it, and, last of all, it is signed, so that, so far as the maker of an instrument could accomplish it, he did all by which he could express his final resolution that his estate, while this paper remained unaltered, should be governed by this paper. For these, and also for the reasons which your Lordships have explained, I quite concur with your Lordships in the judgment which is to be pronounced.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said inter-

No. 168.

July 13, 1881.
Whyte v.
Hamilton, &c.

locutor: Find and declare in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Find that the expenses hitherto incurred by the parties fall to be paid out of the estate of the testator," &c.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 169.

July 14, 1881.
Mather v.
M'Kittrick.

GEORGE MATHER, Pursuer and Appellant.—Rhind—Strachan.

WILLIAM LETHAM M'KITTRICK, Defender and Respondent.—Jameson.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Report—Right of Trustee to withhold Report—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, 19 and 20 Vict., c. 79, sec. 146.—Held (diss. Lord Deas) that when in a bankrupt's sequestration five months have elapsed from the date of the deliverance awarding sequestration, the trustee is not entitled to refuse to deliver to the bankrupt, when required by him, a report under sec. 146 of the above Act "in regard to the conduct of the bankrupt, and as to how far he has complied with the provisions" of the Act.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.
M.

GEORGE MATHER, builder, 3 Elcho Place, Strathbungo, raised this action in the Sheriff Court of Renfrew and Bute against William Letham M'Kittrick, accountant, Glasgow, who was trustee on his sequestrated estate, concluding for decree ordaining the defender "to prepare a report with regard to the pursuer's conduct, and as to how far he, the pursuer, has complied with the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and, in particular, whether he has made a full and fair discovery and surrender of his estate, and whether he has attended the diets of examinations, and whether he has been guilty of any collusion, and whether his bankruptcy has arisen from innocent misfortunes, or losses in business, or from culpable or undue conduct, and forthwith to deliver such report to the pursuer, all in terms of section 146 of the said Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856" (quoted in Lord Mure's opinion).

The defender averred;—(Stat. 1) "The application for pursuer's sequestration was made by the pursuer himself with concurrence of a creditor to the statutory amount, and was made for pursuer's own benefit. Nothing has been realised from the estate by the creditors, and the bankrupt alone has derived any advantage from the sequestration." (Stat. 2) "The defender's remuneration as trustee has been paid, with the exception of a small balance of 10s. 9d., but there remains unpaid a balance of £32, 5s. 1d. of a law account incurred by the defender, as trustee foresaid, to Messrs W. E. and A. J. Annan, writers in Glasgow, for the necessary expenses of pursuer's sequestration." (Stat. 3) "The pursuer, in his business of builder, has recently had some good contracts, for the profits of which he has not accounted. The defender believes and avers that from the profits of these contracts the pursuer is able, or ought to have been able, to pay the balance of the expenses of his sequestration."

The defender pleaded;—(1) The creditors of pursuer having realised nothing from pursuer's sequestration, and the pursuer alone having derived any advantage from it, it is but reasonable that he should pay the expense of the sequestration. (2) The pursuer, being able to pay the balance of the expenses of his sequestration, is not entitled to his discharge, nor to the report asked for, except on condition of his paying the said balance. (3) The pursuer having failed to make a fair discovery and surrender of his estate, the defender is not bound to furnish the report craved.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, and, in hoc statu, refuses the prayer of the petition," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The statute makes it an essential of the bankrupt obtaining his

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.¹

No. 169.

LORD MURE.—In this case the bankrupt has presented a petition, founded on July 14, 1881. the 146th section of the Bankruptcy Act, in which he craves the Sheriff to ordain Mather v. M'Kittrick. the respondent to prepare and deliver a report in terms of that section. He asks for that, and that alone. This is opposed by the respondent, the trustee on the sequestrated estate, on the ground that the bankrupt is due to him certain accounts incurred in the sequestration, and that until these accounts are paid he is not entitled to obtain a report. The Sheriff-substitute has given effect to these defences, and has refused the petition, finding the defender entitled to expenses; and in his note he indicates an opinion that the trustee's objection is, on the merits, a good objection.

Under this application it is maintained that the bankrupt is entitled, as a matter of right, to get what he asks for, and I am unable to read the section founded on without coming to the conclusion that this is the just construction of the statute. The section, after some general provisions relating to the bankrupt's discharge, enacts "that it shall not be competent for the bankrupt to present a petition for his discharge, or to obtain the consent of any creditor to such discharge, until the trustee shall have prepared a report with regard to the conduct of the bankrupt, and as to how far he has complied with the provisions of this Act, and, in particular, whether the bankrupt has made a fair discovery and surrender of his estate, and whether he has attended the diets of examination, and whether he has been guilty of any collusion, and whether his bankruptcy has arisen from innocent misfortunes or losses in business, or from culpable or undue conduct; and such report may be prepared by the trustee, upon the requisition of the bankrupt at any time after the bankrupt's examination, but shall not be demandable from the trustee till the expiration of five months from the date of the deliverance actually awarding sequestration." The matters therefore on which the trustee has to report are as to certain points connected with the bankrupt's conduct and position, which are peculiarly within the cognisance of the trustee, and as to which it is desirable, if not essential, that the Sheriff should be informed when he proceeds to dispose of an application for a discharge. It is made a condition, precedent, moreover, to the bankrupt moving for his discharge, that he shall obtain this report, and I can see nothing in the statute which puts it in the power of the trustee to refuse to deliver the report after the lapse of five months from the date of the deliverance awarding sequestration, whatever discretion he may have in that respect before the expiry of those months. After their expiry he is, I think, bound to prepare and deliver the report.

discharge that there shall be produced a report by the trustee. By necessary implication this contemplates the possibility of there being cases in which the trustee may withhold his report, and while, under the authority of White v. White's Trustee (March 19, 1879), 6 Rettie, 854, the action of a trustee in withholding a report is reviewable by the Court, so that, upon frivolous grounds, he cannot be permitted to do so, yet, where good and sufficient reasons for that action on his part are disclosed, the Court will not compel him to furnish it. In the present case, the bankrupt himself applied for sequestration, which has been carried through for his benefit. It is most unreasonable that he should not pay the expenses incurred. The case referred to at the debate, Napier v. Paterson (Dec. 3, 1850), 13 D. 222, is quite in point."

¹ Authorities—Napier v. Paterson, Dec. 3, 1850, 13 D. 222, 23 Scot. Jur. 82; White v. White's Trustee, March 19, 1879, ante, vol. vi., p. 854.

No. 169.

July 14, 1881.

Mather v.

M'Kittrick.

In the present case the trustee has refused to give the report, because he thinks that there are accounts connected with the sequestration which should first be paid, and the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion, on the authority of the case of Napier v. Paterson, that the trustee is right. Now, the non-payment of these accounts may be a sufficient ground for refusing to grant the bankrupt his discharge, and if the matter had come up before the Sheriff-substitute in the proper way he might have been quite right in refusing the discharge. But, in the present proceeding, on the other hand, I am unable to concur in the conclusion he has come to. The bankrupt, in the view I take of the case, is entitled to demand this report as a matter of right under the provisions of the statute on which he relies; and I have a strong impression that when I was in the Outer-House—and I was Junior Lord Ordinary for a considerable period—I have on several occasions ordered trustees to produce their reports, leaving all questions as to the right of the bankrupt to obtain his discharge to be afterwards disposed of.

LORD DEAS.—In the case of White v. Robertson the trustee declined to make a report, and that refusal was brought under our cognisance on its merits. The question was raised and duly argued whether such refusal was reviewable by the Court. We held that it was. The Sheriff-substitute infers, and I think rightly, from that decision, that, as we reviewed that case on the merits, the present case is also reviewable, to the effect of finding whether the trustee is right or wrong in his refusal. No exception is taken to that finding. Nor is any exception taken to the soundness of the decision in Napier v. Paterson (13 D. 222) that the bankrupt must pay the expenses of the sequestration before he can get his discharge. It is farther conceded that the expense of the trustee's report is part of the expenses of the sequestration, and until the bankrupt pays the expense of that report no application for his discharge can be entertained. My brother, Lord Mure, concedes this, but he says the objection is premature until the discharge be actually applied for,—that is to say, the trustee must be at the trouble and expense of preparing his report, which may in many cases be a laborious document, and take his chance that the bankrupt will think it worth paying for to get presented. Apart from the precise time of enforcing the demand, I do not understand that any of your Lordships would dissent from the Sheriff-substitute's remark that "it is most unreasonable that the bankrupt should not pay the expenses incurred." The objection that the demand, although well-founded in itself, is made prematurely, seems to me in any view too hypercritical to be sustained. I think, therefore, that it is not only in accordance with the statute, but most expedient in itself, that the trustee should have the power to refuse, if he thinks fit, to give his report, otherwise the whole expense of preparing the report may be unnecessarily incurred. I cannot doubt that the Sheriff-substitute has come to the right conclusion as to the import of the case of White v. Robertson, which we had so recently before us. I think the first thing to be done is to consider whether the trustee is right or wrong in his refusal.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with my brother Lord Mure. The 146th section of the Act provides that "if appearance be made by any of the creditors or by the trustee the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, shall judge of any objections against granting the discharge, and shall either find the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, or refuse the discharge, or defer the consideration of the same for such period as he may think proper, and may annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require." Now, this provision of the statute, I think, states distinctly the mode in which a trustee having an objection to the bankrupt's discharge is to assert that objection. This was the course which was followed in Napier v. Paterson, and I do not doubt, on the authority of that case, that the trustee has only to appear and state that the bankrupt has not paid these expenses, and the discharge will not be granted. But the question is, whether the trustee has not put the matter out of proper shape by refusing to give this report, in which he has a personal interest and the bankrupt has a contrary interest. The bankrupt as a preliminary even to moving for his discharge must get the report, for it is provided "that it shall not be competent for the bankrupt to present a petition for his discharge, or to obtain the consent of any creditor to such discharge, until the trustee shall have prepared a report." And it is further provided "that such report shall be produced in the proceedings for the bankrupt's discharge, and shall be referred to by its date, or by any other direct reference, in any consent to his discharge." There is in the statute no indication of any possible ground on which the trustee may refuse to give this report. I take it that it is a statutory duty incumbent on the trustee to deliver the report on the requisition of the bankrupt. The bankrupt may be unable to pay this money now, but he may undertake and be able to pay it before his discharge. The trustee says, "No, you must pay now, and until you pay I will not give you the report." That appears to me to be an unreasonable position. I think it would be unfortunate for us to hold that the trustee has it in his power to put a compulsitor on the bankrupt to oblige him to yield to his demands. The report must be given in, and if the trustee has any objections he may state them when the bankrupt applies for his discharge.

As to White v. Robertson, the first remark I have to make is that the point here raised was not under discussion there; and secondly, there is no real conflict between the two cases. There was a fair ground for arguing, as was done in White v. Robertson, that as a condition of obtaining the report the bankrupt must give a fee for the report. This position we found to be an unsound one, although fairly maintainable, but it has really nothing to do with the general question whether the trustee may withhold his report whenever he thinks fit.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the trustee states,—“The application for the pursuer's sequestration was made by the pursuer himself with the concurrence of a creditor to the statutory amount, and was made for the pursuer's own benefit. Nothing has been realised from the estate by the creditors, and the bankrupt alone has derived any advantage from the sequestration.” The trustee further states,—“The defender's remuneration as trustee has been paid, with the exception of a small balance of 10s. 9d., but there remains unpaid a balance of £32, 5s. 1d. of a law account incurred by the defender, as trustee foresaid, for the necessary expenses of the pursuer's sequestration.” Now, if the facts are as here stated, no one has suggested that there is any doubt that the bankrupt will not get his discharge till these accounts are paid. But undoubtedly there is a question of some importance in practice here raised, namely, whether the non-payment of these expenses is a sufficient reason to entitle the trustee to refuse to give his report, or whether the proper course for the trustee is not rather to give his report, and, if he thinks fit, to appear and oppose the bankrupt's application for discharge. I have had considerable difficulty on this

No. 169.

July 14, 188

Mather v.

M'Kittrick.

No. 169. point, but after full consideration I have come to agree with the majority of your Lordships.

July 14, 1881.
Father v.
Kittrick.

I quite see with Lord Deas that some difficulty arises from the case of White. But, in the first place, the present question, as Lord Shand has pointed out, was not raised in that case. A more important consideration, however, is, that it might be a very good reason for the trustee refusing to give the report that he was entitled to charge a special fee for preparing that report. Because it is quite consistent with practice in other cases that it should be a condition of the delivery of any special report that the person who has prepared the report should be entitled to demand payment of his fee and of the expenses he has incurred, as, for instance, in the case of a decree-arbitral, or where a law-agent has prepared a report for a person who is not his ordinary client. In the case of White we held that the trustee was not entitled to make such a demand. It was quite possible, therefore, to consider that case on the merits, without considering whether in other circumstances and for other expenses the trustee was entitled to refuse to give his report. In this view I do not think that we are precluded by the case of White from considering whether the trustee may refuse to deliver his report on such grounds as he has at present taken up; but on the whole question, I think that the trustee has mistaken his remedy, and that he must wait till the bankrupt's petition for discharge is presented, if it ever is presented, and then oppose the granting of the discharge.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 24th May last, and appoint the trustee to prepare and deliver the report, as prayed for, to the pursuer, in terms of section 146 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either party."

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—HENRY & SCOTT, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 170. REV. JAMES RONALDSON AND OTHERS (Gray's Trustees), Pursuers.—
C. S. Dickson.

July 15, 1881.
Ronaldson, &c.
v. Drummond
& Reid.

DRUMMOND & REID, Defenders.—Pearson.

Agent and Client—Commission—Expenses—Taxation.—When a law-agent employs an auctioneer or other person to do work on behalf of a client he is bound to credit the client with any discount or donation he may receive from the person so employed.

2D DIVISION.
M.

(SEQUEL to case June 7, 1881, supra, p. 767.)

When the Auditor's report in this case was enrolled for approval the defenders, Messrs Drummond & Reid, lodged the following note of objections:—"The defenders object to the report by the Auditor on the account No. 37 of process, on the following grounds:—(1) That in course of the inquiry under the remit it has been ascertained that the pursuers' agents, Messrs James L. Hill & Company, received from Mr Dowell a part of the commission charged by him for selling the furniture, and the full amount of that commission, without crediting the repayment, has been already charged and allowed against the defenders. (2) That the said account, No. 37 of process, as audited, includes charges for the full professional remuneration of the pursuers' said agents connected with the sale of the furniture, and that the discount received out of the auctioneer's commission has not been credited. (3) That the pursuers' agents, being bound to credit the said discount to the pursuers, the latter are bound to credit it in question with the defenders. (4) The pursuers' agents have refused to state the amount of the said commission, and say that it has not been passed through their business books. The defenders believe that the amount of this commission is not less than £35, and they claim that this sum be deducted from the amounts of the accounts as reported by the Auditor." No. 170.

July 15, 1881
Ronaldson, &
v. Drummond
& Reid.

The following letter from Mr J. L. Hill, W.S., whose firm acted for Gray's trustees, to the Auditor, was produced along with the report and objections:—"Dear Sir,—With reference to the taxation on Monday of the non-judicial account in this action I beg to mention that Mr Dowell allowed and paid me a portion of the commission charged by him for the realisation and sale of the furniture pointed and sold in connection with the action. This allowance was treated by Mr Dowell as a personal commission, and he made it when settling other transactions with me, and it thus does not appear in my business books, and so was not known to my clerk who charged the account and attended the taxation. . . . I may also mention that Mr Dowell, in making this allowance, did not charge any higher commission than he would have done had no such allowance been made, but only the commission usually charged by auctioneers, while the allowance is only made in some cases. I send herewith a letter from Mr Dowell on the subject.—I am, yours truly."

Mr Dowell's (the auctioneer's) letter therein referred to was in these terms:—"Messrs Hill & Co., &c.—Gentlemen,—In reply to your query, I beg to state that agents are not entitled to commission from us, or to any share of our commission for conducting sales of property or effects; but there are cases where, from a variety of transactions, and from personal consideration, we occasionally give a donation, which, of course, is directly out of our pockets.—I am," &c.

Counsel having been heard in support of the objections and in reply,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am rather glad that we have an opportunity of expressing our views upon a transaction of this kind; and my opinion is that the system of commissions, as they are called, being a mode by which law-agents wish to make, or are to make, more than they would be really entitled to, and to make it at the expense and without the knowledge either of their clients or of their client's opponents, is not a creditable system, and one which, so far as I am concerned, I shall always discountenance and discourage. It is a system that goes a great deal too far both in high and low transactions; and, in this case, I think, the attempt to charge the unsuccessful party more than was actually paid to Mr Dowell for the work he did cannot be countenanced. I think the objection to the report is well founded, and that that commission should be given credit for in settling the profit and loss.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and concur in every word your Lordship has said. I assume that Mr Dowell was properly paid with the money which he received, and not that he gave back as a charity or an act of kindness to Mr Hill, or any other, a portion of his own proper payment. He gives discount upon receiving payment of his account, and I assume, as I have stated, that he is well and rightly paid with what he actually receives. If Mr Hill charges against his clients, and consequently his clients against their adversaries in this litigation, more than he paid, he charges so much in excess of what he is entitled to. He is remunerated for his services according to the established rules and scale of remuneration, and the law does not permit him to receive more as in a question with his clients; nor consequently will it permit their adversaries in this litigation to be charged with more. If he pockets this, he is pocketing

No. 170.

July 15, 1881.
Ronaldson, &c.
v. Drummond
& Reid.

so much more than he is entitled to for his professional services. His services in this business are charged and paid for according to the proper scale, and it is nothing to the purpose to say that that is a matter between him and his clients. So it is, and nobody else would be concerned if his clients were not making a charge as against these defenders as the unsuccessful parties in a litigation. They very properly take objection to such an item: "You are charging us with an account of Mr Hill's, which, to this extent, is more than it ought to have been, as being, to this extent, in excess of his just charges. He is entitled to credit for what he actually paid to Mr Dowell, and to no more. Quoad ultra he is properly paid and remunerated according to the usual practice."

I quite agree, as I have already said, in all that your Lordship has stated in condemnation of this system, wherever it prevails—and it is matter of common knowledge that it prevails extensively. Tradesmen tip the servants in one's service; the butcher and the grocer tip the cook; the saddler tips the coachman;—indeed it is a system of tipping all round. But it is all paid by the master,—every shilling of it. These tradesmen will not, any more than Mr Dowell did here, as a matter of charity, or personal favour or kindness, give out of their own pockets these allowances; it is all charged against the customer or employer. It is his money that is in this roundabout way given to servants. It is difficult to detect it, no doubt; but where it is exposed to the Court I concur that we should in all cases discountenance and disallow it.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I entirely concur; I concur not only in the result arrived at, but in every word used by your Lordships. I confess that when I was made aware that such an objection was to be brought forward—or rather that the parties thought there was ground for such an objection—I felt much more regret than I have experienced with regard to any occurrence for a very long time. I think a practice like that which has been brought under notice is one which is discreditable to the agents, and certainly injurious to the client. At the time when the money was said to have been received, and the account paid to Dowell, Mr Hill acted for and represented his clients, Gray's trustees, and he was bound at once to carry to their credit the sum he received; and it is really nothing to the purpose to say that one or more of Gray's trustees said they knew about this—knew everything about it. If they were prepared to acquiesce in what was being done by the agent they were doing what was contrary to their trust. For it was not a matter between them and their agent. The trustees were acting for others, and if they did not insist upon the beneficiaries of the trust receiving the benefit which was due them in this matter, instead of the party who happened to be their agent, they were content that the interests of the beneficiaries should be sacrificed. Besides, at the time this payment was made, Mr Hill and the trustees themselves had no warrant for supposing that judgment would be pronounced in favour of the trustees and against Drummond & Reid. The Lord Ordinary had pronounced judgment in favour of Drummond & Reid; but we find that, notwithstanding that fact, the action which Mr Hill upholds would have been such as, had the result been otherwise, to make the trustees debtors for the money claimed by Mr Hill, for they were the persons for whom this account was incurred. Things, as between Mr Hill and the trust, were left in the accounts as if the full sum had been paid.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the practice—if there is a practice, which I must assume, after what has been said—is a most reprehensible one ; No. 170.

 and as this is, so far as I recollect, the first occasion on which this matter has been brought up for judicial determination, so I hope it will be the last. So far it is a matter between Gray's trustees and Mr Hill ; and so far it is between Gray's trustees and Drummond & Reid. I do not think they should have chosen to claim a benefit to which they were not entitled merely for the purpose of increasing the burden to be put on the shoulders of Drummond & Reid. I think such a course is contrary to duty and to common honesty between man and man.

I am very clearly of opinion that the objection ought to be sustained.

THE COURT approved of the Auditor's report, under deduction of the amount of commission returned by Mr Dowell.

JAMES L. HILL & Co., W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

A. F. C. R. BOWMAN BALLANTINE AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—

D.-F. Kinnear—Pattison—Jameson.

DAVID STEVENSON, Defender.—Mackay—Dickson.

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
 Ballantine, &c.
 v. Stevenson.

Lease—Constitution and proof of lease—Implied acceptance of written lease—Rei interventus—Agent and Principal.—A subtenant of a farm, prior to the expiry of the principal lease at Martinmas 1876, entered into negotiations with the Edinburgh agent of the landlord (who resided in England) for a nineteen years' lease, at an increased rent. A lease was adjusted, and, after being signed by the tenant, was sent, in August 1877, by the Edinburgh agent to the London agents of the landlord for his signature. The lease was retained by them till August 1878, the tenant, in the meantime, having been in possession of the farm, and having made a payment to account of the increased rent.

In August 1878 the landlord repudiated the lease, and raised an action of removal against the tenant.

Held that, in the circumstances, implied acceptance of the lease on the part of the landlord had been instructed.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) that the landlord's retention of the lease, signed by the tenant, was in itself sufficient to infer acceptance on his part.

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that rei interventus was necessary to bind the landlord.

ON 27th December 1880 Andrew F. C. R. Bowman Ballantine of Ashgrove, with consent of a Mr Atkins of Southampton, who was designed as "concurring pursuer," and Mr Lamond, S.S.C., as mandatory for Mr Atkins, raised an action in the Court of Session against David Stevenson, designed as farmer, residing at Outerwood. The action concluded for decree of removing against Stevenson from the farm of Outer and Innerwood on the estate of Ashgrove, in Ayrshire, and for damages in case of his continuing to occupy the farm.

The condescendence set forth that Mr Ballantine was heir of entail in possession of Ashgrove, but had, in 1857, prior to his succeeding to the estate, conveyed his life interest therein to Mr Atkins, and had, on 19th November 1880, received a reconveyance from Mr Atkins. It was stated that the defender, David Stevenson, was in possession of the farm of Outer and Innerwood vitiously, and without the leave of either Mr Atkins or Mr Ballantine, and that he refused to remove therefrom, and that the action had thus become necessary.

David Stevenson in his defences relied on a lease of the farm for nineteen years from Martinmas 1876, which he averred he had obtained from

2D DIVISION.
 Id. Curriehill.
 M.

No. 171. Mr Rollo, W.S., who acted as factor for Mr Atkins, and which he, Stevenson, had signed in August 1877. This lease, he stated, had been signed by him, and his brother William Stevenson, as his cautioner, and although he admitted that it had not been signed by Mr Atkins still he averred that it had been acted on by both parties.

July 16, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer, the said Andrew Fitzjames Cunningham Rollo Bowman Ballantine, being proprietor of the lands and farms libelled, is entitled to obtain decree of declarator as concluded for, and to have the defender, David Stevenson, instantly removed and ejected from the said lands and farms as a vitious or precarious possessor. (2) In the circumstances above set forth the defender, who has no legal title of possession, is not only not entitled to retain the occupancy or possession of the said lands and farms against the will of the pursuer, but is liable in all loss and damage arising to the pursuer thereby, and the pursuer is entitled to decree against him as concluded for in that respect, with expenses.

David Stevenson pleaded ;—(1) The defender being tenant of the lands in question under a nineteen years' lease, to run from Martinmas 1876, he should be assoilzied. (2) Separatim, an agreement for a nineteen years' lease in terms of the deed signed by the defender has been constituted, and is now binding under the writings and actings aforesaid.

The Lord Ordinary allowed both parties a proof of their averments.

From the evidence led, and a voluminous correspondence and other documents produced, the following appeared to be the state of the facts :—Mr Bowman Ballantine, in September 1857, conveyed to Mr Atkins his life interest in the entailed estate of Ashgrove, and Mr Atkins was duly infeft on this conveyance. The heir of entail in possession at the time of this conveyance, a Miss Bowman, died in 1859, but on 7th June 1858 she had granted to William Stevenson—David Stevenson's elder brother—a nineteen years' lease of Outer and Innerwood at a rent of £250. This lease had barely run a year when Mr Atkins entered into possession of Ashgrove in consequence of Miss Bowman's death, and William Stevenson continued to possess under it. Mr Atkins managed the estate through his solicitors in London, Messrs Bradby & Robins, who in turn employed Mr Rollo, W.S., Edinburgh, to act for them in Scotland. There was some doubt as to the extent of Mr Rollo's power to bind Mr Atkins. The Stevensons deponed that they looked upon him as factor, with the usual powers of a factor, and that they never heard from or of any one else in connection with the management of the estate. Mr Rollo himself stated, "My professional duties in connection with Ashgrove were generally to manage the estate ; but I was in the habit of consulting Bradby & Robins before doing anything ; I consider that I never acted without their authority." Mr Atkins deponed that Mr Rollo had "no authority to conclude arrangements with any one on my behalf without consulting me through my solicitors." Mr Bradby, of Bradby & Robins, said that he looked upon Mr Rollo as land-agent. "The general duties of attending to the interests of the proprietor in matters of detail were left to him."

William Stevenson, who was also tenant of another farm on the estate of Ashgrove, continued in occupation of the farm until 1867, when he granted a sublease of it to his brother David, who, at same time, purchased the whole stock, &c. from him. This sublease and the receipt for the price of the stock were produced. The Stevensons deponed that this sublease was entered into with Mr Rollo's knowledge and consent, but Mr Rollo, although he admitted that he was aware that David and his family occupied the farm-house, could not remember anything more than that there had been communings as to a sublease.

In February 1875, when the lease of the farm had less than two years to run, the roof of the barn fell in, and Mr Rollo afterwards obtained a report from a Mr Stewart, factor to the Earl of Eglinton, as to what was best to be done. This report was dated 7th May 1875, and in it Mr Stewart recommended that the roof should be repaired, and the walls of the barn raised at the landlord's expense, the tenant being charged five per cent on the outlay. Mr Rollo sent the report to Bradby & Robins on 19th June, but received no answer from them on the point. He wrote again on this subject, on 4th January 1876, as follows:—"I must again refer to the repair of the roof of the barn on the farm-steading occupied by Stevenson. I am rather at a loss what to advise. Mr Atkins' tenure of the estate depends upon the life of Mr Bowman Ballantine. Then there is only one year of the lease to run, so that it is not worth Stevenson's while himself to be at much outlay, even although by not doing so he puts himself to inconvenience. The farm will certainly not let without the houses being repaired, and when a new lease is entered into there is every reason to suppose there will be a rise of rent. The Stevensons are most respectable men, and I think a good deal of the younger brother, who occupies this farm. How would it do to enter into an agreement with the Stevensons that Mr Atkins will repair the barn, the Stevensons paying say six or seven per cent till the present lease runs out, and then, if Mr Atkins is still in possession, that they will retake the farm on a new lease, and let us have the farm revalued to see what the increase of rent would be? It is quite evident that when the lease does run out the steadings must be repaired. I will be glad to hear from you."

No. 171.
July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

On 5th February 1876 Messrs Bradby & Robins wrote:—"In reply to your letter of the 4th we beg to say that we have been waiting to confer with our client.

"We think your suggestion to repair the barn, Stevenson paying £7 per cent on the outlay, and agreeing to retake the farm at a rent to be ascertained by a revaluation, should be adopted. . . . Please do what is right according to the respective obligations of the landlord and tenant, and not expending more than is absolutely necessary."

About this period Mr Rollo had some conversations with the Stevensons as to a renewal of the lease. He afterwards obtained another report from Mr Stewart as to the letting value of the farm, &c., and on 5th June 1876 wrote Bradby & Robins—"As I sometime since wrote to you, Stevenson's farm of Outerwood runs out this Martinmas, and I now enclose report by Mr Stewart as to what he proposed should be done in the event of a new lease being entered into. The rise of rent is considerable, but then there is the required outlay. Whitehirst also runs out this November, and, as you will observe, Mr Stewart proposes the two farms should be joined. The change of steadings, however, will be a very serious matter as to expense. Considering the tenure upon which the estate is held, depending upon Mr Ballantine's life, the repairing of steadings is a matter attended with difficulty, and requires some consideration."

Mr Stewart in his report, which was dated 10th April 1876, recommended that the rent be increased from £250 to £285, on condition of the landlord repairing the barn roof and raising the walls. If these repairs were executed by the tenant he advised an allowance of 7½ per cent on the tenant's outlay, which he estimated would reduce the rent to £270.

Some question having arisen as to Mr Atkins' power to grant leases, Mr Rollo took the opinion of counsel (Mr Kinnear) upon the point, and on 7th September 1876 wrote as follows:—"I now enclose copy of the

No. 171. memorial which I laid before counsel as to these matters, from which you will find that he considers Mr Atkins has the power to grant leases on the usual terms, not exceeding nineteen years, and that the guardian of the next heir has no title to make the claim he has done. . . . I can see no reason why we should not enter into a treaty with Mr Stevenson for a new lease of the subjects."

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

On 9th September Bradby & Robins answered—"We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, enclosing copy of statement laid before counsel, and of his opinion thereon, and which seems satisfactory."

In the meantime Mr Rollo had been in communication with William Stevenson as to the proposed new lease, and had based his suggestions upon Mr Stewart's report. On 3d November 1876 Mr Rollo sent William Stevenson a draft lease of the farm for his consideration. This draft had previously been gone over by Mr Stewart, who had inserted a provision that the repairs to be executed by the tenant should be completed within two years of the entry.

After meetings with the Stevensons the draft lease was agreed upon. The lease as finally adjusted was in name of David Stevenson as tenant, with William Stevenson as cautioner.

On 22d August 1877 the extended lease was sent to the Stevensons for signature, and on its being returned by them, duly signed, Mr Rollo, on 28th August 1877, wrote to Bradby & Robins—"I now enclose for the signature of Mr Atkins the lease to Mr Stevenson of the farm of The Wood."

No notice was taken of this letter, but in the meantime an action had been commenced in the Court of Session at the instance of Mr Ballantine's trustee against Mr Atkins, with a view to the reduction of the conveyance of the life interest in Ashgrove.

Messrs Bradby & Robins, on 26th October 1877, wrote—"Our client thinks he ought not to sign any new lease pending the litigation which has been commenced against him."

On 11th December 1877 Mr Rollo wrote urging that the lease be completed. Messrs Bradby & Robins replied on 31st December 1877—"With regard to Stevenson's lease we are instructed to say that our client does not think of renewing it. We conclude that you have not agreed to any renewal."

They wrote again on 9th January 1878,—“Mr Atkins intended to have the farm revalued before granting any new lease, and will not grant a new lease on the old terms.” On 26th February 1878 they wrote,—“Our client trusts he is not committed to a renewal of Mr Stevenson's lease.”

They wrote again on 9th March 1878—"We shall be glad to hear whether the arrangement with Stevenson is obligatory on our client, as he is not desirous of granting a new lease on the present terms. No valuation has taken place for fifty years. It is not, therefore, simply a question of the right or power of our client to grant the new lease, but he does not wish to do so." . . . And on 16th May 1878—"Will you be so good as to inform us by return of post what is Mr Stevenson's position? We conclude he is now only a tenant at will, or at most a yearly tenant."

Mr Rollo, on 17th May 1878, wrote in answer—"As to Stevenson, we have no such thing in Scotland as tenants of farms at will or even yearly tenants. The renewal of the lease and its terms were fully considered, and on referring back to the correspondence you will find such to be the case, and that it was not gone into until the opinion of counsel was taken, a copy of which was sent to you. . . . Stevenson having signed the lease, and continued in possession, besides making a payment to account of rent, must be considered as the tenant for the duration of the lease. As he, however, was to lay out a certain sum in repairing the barn, as you will find on referring to the lease, I have little doubt that if a change of arrangement was wished he would agree to anything reasonable.

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

Messrs Bradby & Robins wrote on 10th June 1878—"With respect to the proposed new lease to Mr Stevenson, our client will not grant it on the old terms, should he be disposed to grant it at all. Mr Stevenson should, without delay, be made to clearly understand that our client has never agreed to grant him a new lease."

Mr Rollo, on 14th June 1878, answered,—“With reference to the lease with Stevenson, the same was arranged on the report of Mr Stewart, factor for the Earl of Eglinton, who is well qualified to value farms such as this. Stevenson's former rent was only £250, and the rent under his new lease is £270, with an obligation on him to expend the sum of £200 in repairing the barn, &c., which is equal to at least other £12 of rent, and this is a considerable rise considering the state of agricultural matters. As I have stated before, there is not such a thing in Scotland as a yearly tenant of a farm such as Stevenson's, and you are aware the matter was not gone into until the opinion of counsel was taken, and with which you expressed yourself satisfied.”

On 20th June 1878, Messrs Bradby & Robins again wrote, repeating the statement that Mr Atkins had never consented to grant a new lease, and requesting Mr Rollo to inform Stevenson that no lease would be granted.

To this Mr Rollo answered, on 25th June 1878, as follows:—"As the former lease expired on Martinmas 1876, there was no time to lose, and I proceeded to arrange with Stevenson, adopting the alternative of Mr Stewart's report of Mr Stevenson being taken bound to lay out £200 upon the barn, and to pay £270 of rent, which was most advantageous for Mr Atkins, as it saved him laying out the money. Of course Mr Stevenson would not lay out the money without a lease, and no new tenant would take the barn as it now stands. Mr Stevenson has not yet commenced to the barn, and if Mr Atkins desires to change the arrangement, I can make an overture to Mr Stevenson upon the subject."

Messrs Bradby & Robins replied, on 6th July 1878,—“We have looked through the letters and papers referred to in your letter of the 25th ulto., and do not see that our letters convey any instructions from our client to renew Mr Stevenson's lease. Our client trusts that you have not pledged him to do this. If you will kindly refer to our letters for some considerable time past, you will, we think, see the anxiety of our client to ascertain the exact position of the matter. Please let us hear distinctly, for the information of our client, what is the legal position of the matter.”

On 9th July 1878, Mr Rollo wrote in answer recapitulating the correspondence, specially referring to the letter from Bradby & Robins of 5th February 1876, and to the fact of the lease executed by the Stevensons having been sent on 28th August 1877. Several letters, to a similar effect, passed between Mr Rollo and Messrs Bradby & Robins, and on August 1st 1878 the latter wrote positively declining, on behalf of Mr Atkins, to grant a lease. Mr Rollo, in answer on 5th August 1878, wrote enclosing his accounts for the estate up to 30th June, in which he gave effect to the increased rent under the new lease. On August 6th 1878, Messrs Bradby & Robins wrote, stating that to their minds the alleged increase of rent had not been paid. Mr Rollo, on 7th August 1878, wrote,

No. 171. pointing out that the increased rent, or a part thereof, had, in fact, been paid by David Stevenson and accepted; and on 13th August 1878, Bradby & Robins admitted that this money had been received, but explained that no part of it had been received until Mr Atkins' intention not to grant a lease had been communicated to Mr Rollo. They also instructed Mr Rollo thenceforward only to remit the old rent, and not the increased one.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

Mr Rollo had, on 7th August 1878, written to David Stevenson, informing him that Mr Atkins was not at that time prepared to sign the lease, but that was the first intimation sent Stevenson of the position of affairs.*

In April 1879 the agency was taken from Mr Rollo and given to Messrs Campbell & Lamond, C.S., and, on 19th April 1879, Messrs Bradby & Robins wrote two letters, one to each of the Stevensons, directed to their respective farms, giving them notice to pay no more rent to Mr Rollo.

Mr Bradby deponed that he had all along understood that William Stevenson was the person about whom the correspondence had been conducted, and that although he had noticed David Stevenson's name occasionally, he had not realised that he was another person from William.

On 20th September 1880, prior to the raising of this action, Mr Atkins, with the concurrence of Mr Ballantine, raised an action of removing in the Sheriff Court at Ayr against William Stevenson, which he defended, and in which he admitted he had no title to occupy the farm, and stated that he was not in occupation thereof, but that David Stevenson was so, in virtue of the lease from Mr Atkins.

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d June 1881, found (1) "that the defender, David Stevenson, is in the possession and occupation of the farm of Outerwood and Innerwood,—part of the estate of Ashgrove belonging to the pursuer—as a yearly tenant, until the term of Martinmas next (1881) as to the arable lands, until Candlemas 1882 as to the yards, and until 1st May 1882 as to the houses, grass, and other pertinents, at the yearly rent of £250 sterling, payable in equal proportions at the term of Martinmas 1881 and Whitsunday 1882 respectively; and (2) that the said David Stevenson is bound to remove from the said farm and other premises as follows, viz., from the arable lands at the said term of Martinmas 1881, from the yards at Candlemas 1882, and from the houses, grass, and other pertinents, at 1st May 1882; and with these findings, appoints the case to be enrolled for further procedure, reserving all questions of expenses: Grants leave to both parties to reclaim, if so advised."†

* Up to this date David Stevenson had not executed the repairs, &c., stipulated for in the lease.

† "NOTE.—The pursuer, Mr Bowman Ballantine, is heir of entail in possession of the estate of Ashgrove, in Ayrshire. Although he succeeded to that estate in 1859, on the death of his predecessor Miss Bowman, he did not come into the actual possession of the estate until 1879, in respect that in anticipation of his succession he sold his life interest to Mr Edward Atkins of Southampton, who remained in possession until a year or two ago, when he resold the interest to the pursuer. During his possession Mr Atkins granted leases of the farms, and exercised all the rights of owner.

"In 1876 the lease of the farm of Outerwood and Innerwood, which had been held by William Stevenson for at least one term of nineteen years, expired, and negotiations took place for a renewal thereof. Mr Atkins at no time took any personal part in the management of the estate, but left the whole administration in the hands of Mr Bradby, a London solicitor, and the firm of Bradby & Robins, of which he was for some time a partner. These gentlemen employed Mr Hugh James Rollo, W.S., of Edinburgh, as their local agent and factor, and entrusted him to a large extent with the details of the management. In 1877 Mr Rollo prepared a lease of the said farm for nineteen years from Martinmas 1876

Stevenson reclaimed, and argued;—Mr Rollo had the power to bind his principal in a lease, and consequently this lease, even though as yet

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

in name of David Stevenson, a younger brother of William Stevenson (William Stevenson being bound as cautioner), and on 28th August 1877, he sent it, duly executed by these two persons, to Messrs Bradby & Robins for Mr Atkins' signature. Mr Atkins never signed the lease, but David Stevenson has been in possession of the farms on the footing that he had been accepted as tenant under the lease. The pursuer now repudiates the lease, and has brought this action against David Stevenson to have it declared that he has no right or title to possess the farm, to have him immediately removed from the premises, and to have him ordained to pay £1 per day from the date of citation, as damages for alleged illegal occupation.

"The question between the parties depends mainly upon the extent of Mr Rollo's authority. In the first place, it is certain he had no direct authority from Mr Atkins to enter into leases with tenants, but he may have had authority from Messrs Bradby & Robins, who had full power to bind Mr Atkins in the matter. Mr Atkins, on this point, says,—'Mr Rollo had no authority to conclude arrangements with any one on my behalf, without consulting me through my solicitors. The amount of his authority must be judged by what passed between him and my London solicitors.' In the next place, it is certain Mr Rollo had no general authority from Messrs Bradby & Robins to enter into leases on behalf of Mr Atkins—each transaction required their special sanction. Indeed, this was frankly admitted by Mr Rollo himself, for he says, —'My professional duties in connection with Ashgrove were generally to manage the estate; but I was in the habit of consulting Bradby & Robins before doing anything. I consider that I never acted without their authority. The authority I had with regard to this lease was their letter of 5th February (1876), which I got in reply to my letter of 4th January.'

"It thus becomes necessary to examine carefully, not only the two letters referred to by Mr Rollo, but the whole subsequent correspondence, in order to see whether he had any authority, express or implied, to enter into the lease now in question.

"It appears that in 1875, while William Stevenson was tenant of the farm with a year and a half of his lease still to run, the roof of the barn had fallen in, not from any fault of the tenant, but from sheer natural decay. Mr Rollo obtained a report on the subject from Mr Stewart, factor to the Earl of Eglinton, dated 7th May 1875, suggesting that the landlord should renew the roof, and raise the walls of the barn, and charge the tenant interest on the outlay. This report was sent by Mr Rollo to Messrs Bradby & Robins on 19th June 1875, but no answer having been returned, Mr Rollo wrote to them on 4th January 1876 the letter referred to in Mr Rollo's deposition, and as its terms are most material to the present issue, it is desirable to quote them at length :—(quoted in narrative).

"It is important to observe with reference to this letter (1) that it calls the attention of Bradby and Robins to the fact that, as Stevenson's lease was about to expire, it was not worth his while to lay out money in repairing the barn unless on the footing of the lease being renewed; (2) that although the 'younger' Stevenson here referred to is undoubtedly David Stevenson the defender, his name is not mentioned, and there is no reason to suppose that Bradby and Robins had ever heard of him previously, although he had de facto been in possession of the farm for some time as subtenant of his brother William; and (3) that Mr Rollo's proposal is to let the farm on a new lease to 'the Stevensons,' i.e., the two brothers, on condition of their paying six or seven per cent on the landlord's outlay for repairs at an increased rent to be ascertained by revaluation of the farm. To that letter Bradby and Robins reply, on 5th February 1876, as follows :—(quoted in narrative).

"Now, if I rightly construe this letter, Mr Rollo's suggestion as to the younger Stevenson is ignored, and a renewal in favour of William Stevenson alone is what is contemplated by Bradby and Robins, but they approve of such

No. 171. unexecuted by the landlord, was a valid and effectual one.¹ Even if he had not had that power originally the lease had now been made effectual

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

a lease being granted to him, at a rent to be ascertained by revaluation; all the details being left to Mr Rollo, who is empowered to make the best bargain he can for the landlord. Mr Rollo, in consequence, procured from Mr Stewart a revaluation of the farm, dated 10th April 1876, in which it was suggested that the rent, which had hitherto been £250, should be fixed at £285, on the footing that the landlord should expend £200 on additions and repairs, but that a deduction of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent should be allowed if the outlay on repairs should be undertaken by the tenant, in which case the rent would be £270. On 5th June 1876 Mr Rollo wrote to Bradby & Robins as follows":—(quoted in narrative).

"About this time some difficulty seems to have been started in London as to the power of Mr Atkins to grant leases at all. Mr Rollo, however, by the instructions of Messrs Bradby and Robins, consulted Mr Kinnear on the subject, whose opinion was in favour of Mr Atkins' power. This opinion was communicated to Bradby & Robins by Mr Rollo in a letter of 7th September, in which he says,—'I can see no reason why we should not enter into a treaty with Mr Stevenson for a new lease of the subjects.' Reading that letter, as I think it ought to be read, in connection with the previous correspondence, I think the fair meaning of it is that Mr Rollo should, if Bradby & Robins were at length satisfied that Mr Atkins had power to grant leases, he (Mr Rollo) should now negotiate a new lease on the footing of the instructions in Bradby & Robins' letter of 5th February 1876, giving effect to Mr Stewart's revaluation, and making the best arrangements in his power as to the repairs.

"Messrs Bradby & Robins reply on 9th September as follows:—

"'We beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., enclosing copy of statement laid before counsel, and of his opinion thereon, and which seems satisfactory.'

"Now, it appears to me that if Bradby & Robins disapproved of Mr Rollo going on to transact the renewal of the lease with Stevenson, or were not yet prepared to advise their client that he might safely grant the lease, or had any other objection to granting a new lease to Stevenson on the terms proposed, they were bound to have said so explicitly to Mr Rollo. They knew that Stevenson's existing lease would expire within two months; that he was anxiously awaiting the decision of his landlord as to the renewal; they had already, on 5th February 1876, with their client's approval, authorised Mr Rollo to conclude a new lease with Stevenson; rents, &c., to be fixed by revaluation; that revaluation had been made and communicated to them, and apparently the new lease would have been granted in May or June but for the difficulty as to Mr Atkins' powers, which was now satisfactorily obviated by Mr Kinnear's opinion. In my opinion, therefore, Mr Rollo was fully justified in holding that from and after 9th September 1876 he was authorised by Bradby & Robins to enter into the new lease with Stevenson on such one of the alternatives suggested by Mr Stewart as he might think best for the landlord's interests. Acting in this belief, therefore, and selecting the alternative (unquestionably favourable to Mr Atkins) by which the tenant was to spend within two years £200 in raising the walls and renewing the roof of the barn, and in making other repairs and additions, Mr Rollo, on 25th September, wrote to William Stevenson proposing a new lease on these terms, and he shortly thereafter arranged to relet the farm to Stevenson for nineteen years from Martinmas 1876 as to the arable lands, from Candlemas 1877 as to the yards, and from 1st May as to the houses, grass, and pertinents. The draft lease was accordingly prepared in name of William Stevenson, giving effect to these terms, and was sent to him for revision; and if it had been written out and signed by William Stevenson, and if he had thereafter continued to occupy the farm, I should have had little difficulty in holding by the landlord's acquiescence and by the rei interventus which had followed upon it.¹ This was the only view on which the tenant could

¹ Lady Moray v. Stewart, July 23, 1772, M. 4,392, H. L.; Stewart v. Countess of Moray, March 24, 1778, 2 Pat. App. 317; Storey on Agency, p. 256.

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

that Mr Rollo had let the farm to him with the authority of the landlord (Mr Atkins), and his responsible London solicitors, Messrs Bradby & Robins.

"The lease however, was not made out in name of William Stevenson, but in favour of his brother David Stevenson, William being merely cautioner. This alteration was made apparently at the request of both brothers when they saw Mr Rollo in Edinburgh in November or December 1876, but unfortunately the proposed change of tenant was not communicated to Bradby & Robins, Mr Rollo having apparently thought this unnecessary, as he had in his letter of 4th January 1876 suggested a joint lease to the two brothers. But he had evidently overlooked the facts (1) that Messrs Bradby and Robins had entirely ignored that suggestion, and (2) that in all his subsequent correspondence with these gentlemen and with William Stevenson, it was William, and William alone, who was contemplated as the new lessee. I assume that David Stevenson is in every way an unexceptionable tenant, but that is not enough. The delectus personæ, which is the right of a landlord, would be rendered of no avail if, after he had agreed to let his land to A, his agents were, without his authority, to let it to B, even although B was entirely unexceptionable, and although A were, as in the present case, to be cautioner for B.

"In my opinion, therefore, authority, either express or implied (assuming such to be proved), to enter into a lease with William Stevenson, cannot be held to be sufficient authority to enter into a lease with a third party, for in that light David Stevenson must be regarded in a question with Mr Atkins and his London solicitors.

"It is said, however, that the lease has been adopted or rendered binding by rei interventus. The facts are that the lease was signed by David Stevenson in August 1877, and was on 28th August sent by Mr Rollo to Bradby & Robins for the signature of Mr Atkins. Unfortunately Mr Rollo did not in his letter which accompanied the lease call their attention to the fact that David Stevenson was made tenant instead of William Stevenson, who had been the previous tenant. Messrs Bradby & Robins seem to have laid the lease aside without looking at it, partly because it was the long vacation, and partly because Mr Atkins had a difficulty about granting any lease at the time, there having been some question as to leases generally between him and the present pursuer, who was then contemplating the re-purchase of the estate. Whatever the cause may have been, Bradby & Robins did not seem to have looked at the lease, or become aware that David Stevenson was made tenant, for about a year after it was sent to them. That, however, is only one circumstance in the case, and if it had happened that David Stevenson on the faith of the lease had not only entered into possession of the farm, but had made outlays upon it in executing the extensive repairs which the lease bound him to make, and had paid the increased rent stipulated by the lease, and if that rent had been accepted without any observation or objection by Bradby & Robins, I think it would have been extremely difficult for Mr Atkins, or for the pursuer, to maintain that the lease, though unsigned by Atkins, was not now a binding lease. But, then, the state of the facts is quite different. In October, or sometime towards the end of 1877, Bradby and Robins wrote to Mr Rollo that Mr Atkins was not to grant any lease, and in the course of the following year they repeated that statement again and again, always expressing their hope that Mr Atkins was not committed to any lease. And on, at least, three occasions, viz., 10th June, 20th June, and 6th August 1878, they desired Mr Rollo to communicate to Mr Stevenson that no lease would be granted. Now, up to this time, in point of fact, Bradby & Robins seem not to have known that the lease was in favour of David Stevenson, and it was only on 13th August 1878 that they became aware of this. On the

¹ Graham v. Gowans, Nov. 20, 1792, Hume's Dec., 784; Macrorie v. M'Whirter, Dec. 18, 1810, F. C.; Macpherson v. Macpherson, May 12, 1815, F. C.; Forbes v. Wilson, Feb. 22, 1873, 11 Macph. 454, 45 Scot. Jur. 276.

No. 171. be held to occupy the farm, as tacit relocation could not follow on a sublease,¹ which had been the present tenant's only title before he got this lease.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

other hand, I think that so soon as Mr Rollo heard from Bradby & Robins that no lease would be granted, he ought to have informed David Stevenson of the fact, and ought not to have delayed his intimation till 7th August 1878. Still, his failure to make such communication could not have been founded upon by the defender, as in a question with Mr Atkins, whatever claim it might have given to him against Mr Rollo. But, in truth, there seems to be no ground whatever upon which any such claim can be supported, or any case of rei interventus which can be made out. It is quite plain from the evidence of the defender himself that the result of all his communings with Mr Rollo was that he quite understood that, until the lease should be signed by Mr Atkins, he had no security that his tenancy would be permanent. Indeed, he says very candidly when asked about Mr Rollo's letter to him of 7th August 1878,—‘Up to that time I did not think there was anything wrong with the lease, and I had written to see if we were to get a copy of it, so that we might go on with the repairs.’ It is thus very plain that for twelve months after he had signed the lease, and up to the time when he was definitely informed that the lease would not be signed by Mr Atkins, the defender thoroughly understood that unless the lease was executed by Mr Atkins, and he was certiorated of the fact by getting a copy of the completed lease, he would not be in safety to proceed with the execution of any of the repairs which he had undertaken to make.

“Now, as to the alleged facts upon which the defender founds as amounting to rei interventus, viz., possession, payment of the increased rent, and execution of the repairs, the proof negatives all of these allegations. In the first place, the possession of the defender is not to be attributed to the lease now in question; it had begun long before that lease was ever thought of; he had for years previously been his brother's subtenant, and he just continued, after Martinmas 1876, to occupy and labour the farm as before. In the second place, in point of fact he did not pay the increased rent, at all events until sometime after he had been informed that the new lease had been repudiated by Mr Atkins. Indeed, he seems to have been generally in arrear. And in the third place, he did not until 1880, shortly before this action was raised, and long after he knew that the lease was repudiated, execute any repairs upon the steading. It is thus impossible for the defender to maintain either that the lease was adopted or homologated by Mr Atkins or his solicitors, Bradby & Robins, or that anything has been done by him (the defender) on the faith of the lease which he would not have done if the lease had never been even proposed. In short, there has been no rei interventus.

“From what has been said, it follows that, in my opinion, the lease cannot be founded on by the defender as a title to possess the farm as tenant for nineteen years from Martinmas 1876. But, while that is my opinion, I think there is enough in the proof to shew that, de facto, the defender has been recognised both by Mr Atkins and by the pursuer, for some time before this action was raised, as a yearly tenant of the farm. He was allowed by Mr Atkins to remain in possession and occupation after it was known that he, and not William, was de facto occupying the farm, and a certain amount of rent was accepted from him each year. And, by the pursuer's own agents, he was entered in the valuation-roll for 1879-80 as tenant of the farm without a lease, at the rent of £250. I do not know whether, or in what character, he was entered in the roll for 1880-81, but, in point of fact, he was allowed to begin a new year's tenancy at Martinmas 1880 without objection, for this action was not raised against him till 27th December 1880. It is impossible, therefore, for me to pronounce decree of declarator in the terms sought by the pursuer, viz., that the defender has no right or title to occupy or possess the farm. But I propose to find that the defender is in possession as a yearly tenant until Martinmas 1881 as to the

¹ Ersk. Inst., ii, 6, 36.

Argued for Ballantine and others ;—The lease being ultra vires of Mr Rollo to grant, and never having been approved of or signed by the landlord, was ineffectual. The defender was, therefore, in occupation of the farm without any habile title. There had been no change of possession or expenditure on repairs, &c. so as to give rise to the plea of rei interventus. The occupation could easily be attributed to other causes than the alleged new lease. The landlord had never with his knowledge and consent taken any increase of rent.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action which has been carefully argued, and which raises some difficult and important questions.

The substance of the decree which the pursuer asks is, that the defender, David Stevenson, shall be forthwith removed from the farm of Outerwood, which, he says, is his property ; and the ground upon which the demand is made is, that it is not let to David Stevenson, and that he has no right of occupation of any kind.

The defence which is made by Mr David Stevenson, who is the principal tenant according to his own statement, is that he is possessing, and has possessed since 1877, under a lease signed by himself as principal tenant, and by his brother William Stevenson as his cautioner, and that consequently he is entitled to run out his term. The lease has been produced out of the hands of Mr Rollo, who acted as agent for the landlord, and it is signed by both the Stevensons, and is dated in August 1877. But it is not signed by the landlord. The contention between the parties is this, on the one hand the pursuer says that the defender has not a lease which authorises possession, because the document is incomplete ; on the other hand, it is said that that is wholly immaterial when the landlord, who could have signed at any time, has not chosen to do so, because his retention of the lease, and his suffering the possession by the defender to continue under it, implies an acceptance of the terms specified in the lease on the part of the landlord, and is equivalent to his signature.

These are, shortly, the questions that arise in this case, which has some features, I think, altogether peculiar to itself. I have never seen a case precisely of the same kind, although the category of cases to which it belongs is one of the commonest in the law of landlord and tenant. The condition in which this lease—the uncompleted lease—stands is this : William Stevenson, the brother, arable lands, and until Candlemas 1882 as to the yards, and until 1st May 1882 as to the houses, grass, &c., and that he is bound to remove from the several premises at these respective dates. As to the rent, I think it would be unreasonable to hold the defender bound to pay the increased rent which he was willing to pay only in respect of a nineteen years' lease, and I therefore think the rent of £250 (the old rent) is a fair and reasonable rent to fix, the more so as it is the rent entered by the pursuer himself, or by his instructions, in the valuation-roll. In this view of the case, of course, the pursuer's claim of damages for illegal occupation falls to the ground, the defender, on the other hand, being bound to pay the rent. It was very fairly stated at the debate by the counsel for the pursuer that the pursuer would give the defender credit for any outlay which he could establish as having been made in substantial repairs and meliorations.

“Decree of removing as at Martinmas, Candlemas, and 1st May, all next, has not been pronounced, but the pursuer will be entitled to such decree should he find it necessary to press for it. But I do not anticipate that such a step will be necessary. The case is ordered to the roll that this question, as well as the question of expenses, may be discussed.”

No. 171.
July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

No. 171. who appears in the written instrument as cautioner, was the principal tenant both of this farm and of another, and his brother David Stevenson was his sub-tenant in the particular farm in question. That state of matters had continued July 15, 1881. until 1876 under a written lease for nineteen years. The lease expired at that time, and in 1876, therefore, it was necessary to consider what course the tenant and landlord were to follow. The landlord at that time was Mr Atkins, who is here for his interest, and is in reality a creditor of the real proprietor, but holding, I fancy, a disposition of his life interest, or his interest, whatever it was, and entitled, if he chose, to let the farm. Messrs Bradby & Robins, solicitors, London, acted both for the money-lender and for the proprietor, and were entitled, as such persons are entitled in matters of that sort, to let the lands. It seems that Mr Hugh Rollo acted as agent in Scotland for these parties.

Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

Now, the farm buildings having gone into disrepair, and there being considerable difficulty and question as to the title of the real and radical proprietor, it became necessary to take some measures to have them repaired, and Mr Rollo's advice was that a new lease for nineteen years was the only way of doing that satisfactorily; and he wrote at the same time to say that he had a very good opinion of David Stevenson, the brother of the former tenant.

The result was, that after some question as to Mr Atkins' power Mr Rollo recommended that a lease should be granted, and granted to Stevenson. It was revised by Mr Stewart, the factor to the Earl of Eglinton, in whose opinion in such matters Mr Rollo had confidence, and there was an obligation inserted in the draft lease which Mr Rollo submitted to the tenants about the improvement of the farm, and the payment of an increased rent. And after all that had been done, Mr Rollo, on the 28th of August 1877, enclosed for the signature of Mr Atkins the lease to Mr Stevenson of the farm of Outerwood. Mr Rollo then concluded that everything was settled, and David Stevenson, the tenant, was in possession of the farm. He had been his brother's subtenant in the prior nineteen years' lease, and by tacit relocation he had possessed from Martinmas 1876, when that lease ran out. Mr Rollo was of opinion then, and expressed himself so in his letters, that that bargain was completed, and the lease executed by David Stevenson as principal tenant and by William Stevenson as cautioner was thus handed to the landlord in August 1877. The Stevensons never heard a word, according to the evidence and according to my opinion, of the objection to that lease or repudiation of it until the month of August 1878, being a full year after the execution of the new lease by them. Then Mr Rollo was asked by the landlord or by the agents of the landlord to repudiate the whole transaction.

Now, that is the feature which I mentioned as being wholly peculiar to this case. I have never seen a case where the landlord, after getting a regularly executed instrument to which his tenant and his cautioner were conclusively bound, and which he could have made effectual at any time, sought at the distance of twelve months to repudiate such an instrument.

I am of opinion in this case that he cannot be allowed to do so.

The law upon this matter is not in the slightest degree either doubtful or matter of rare occurrence or decision. It is perfectly well settled in numberless cases. I refer the parties to an analogous instance, stronger in some respects for the tenants, and weaker in others, and of so recent date as the year 1872—the case of Forbes v. Wilson (Feb. 22, 1873, 11 Macph. 454) in this Division. That case was substantially a case of this description. There was an application by Mr Wilson, a factor, to be allowed to lease a piece of ground that was the subject of an excambion—a current excambion between Mr Forbes of Callander and his neighbour. Mr Wilson wrote a letter to the landlord, Mr Forbes, offering to lease the ground at 15s. per annum. Mr Forbes sent no answer whatever to that, but Mr Wilson, assuming that this implied an acceptance on the part of the landlord, proceeded to execute the work which he intended to do on this piece of ground. Then after the lapse of some time Mr Forbes said—“Oh, there is no lease here. I never consented to the lease. I never heard of it. You may have arranged it with my agent, but I knew nothing about it.” But the Court would not have that from him. Lord Cowan, after recounting the facts of the case, says this—“Mr Wilson entered into possession even before the late Mr Forbes’ death, which occurred soon after the date of the offer referred to, and laid out a large sum of money in forming an avenue to his house of Bantaskine through the strip of ground, the formation of which was the very object of the excambion, the excambied ground being used for that purpose. There was thus fixed on the late Mr Forbes an obligation to give effect to this lease. Nothing is better established than that such a conjunction of circumstances is quite sufficient to constitute a valid and binding contract of lease.” Then, in the same case, Lord Neaves observes—“It may be that Mr Forbes is quite correct in stating that he had no personal knowledge of what had been arranged, and of what operations were going on in respect to the strip of ground in dispute; but I must hold that every proprietor, whether he mismanages his estate or not, is presumed to know all about what goes on in connection with it, and especially what passes with the full knowledge of his own servants.”

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Bellantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

Now, here we have the fact that the landlord has held for a whole year an obligation on his tenant which he could have enforced at any time during that period, and the question is, whether he is entitled at the end of that period to repudiate the counter obligation.

Now, undoubtedly, I should not have been inclined to think that an acceptance on the part of the landlord was to be presumed from the construction of the document itself if the parties had refrained from acting on it—that is to say, if this had been the lease of a subject which David Stevenson did not occupy, and the term of entrance to the land had arrived, and nothing had been done. That might undoubtedly have altered the circumstances. That might have shewn that the tenant was not in any better position than the landlord. But I think there are two grounds on which the tenant here is entitled to continue his possession under the lease. The first is an implied acceptance by the landlord of the terms which had been signed by the tenant and his cautioner, although he himself did not sign the instrument that was in his own hands, which implied acceptance necessarily arises in a year to year tenancy. And I state that separately, because I am by no means prepared to say that any specific kind of rei interventus would be required to validate that implied acceptance. It is a question of contract, and if there is ground to infer from the legal actings of one of the parties that he has assented to the contract—the written contract of the other—I am far from being prepared to say that that would not by itself go a long way; but it is unnecessary that I should found any part of my judgment here upon that, because I am quite clear that this contract was acted upon as far as circumstances would permit, and that in the knowledge of the landlord. It is perfectly true that David Stevenson was in possession before the commence-

No. 171. ment of this new lease, and therefore there could be no change of possession

—
July 15, 1881. when he went on under the new arrangement. That is quite true ; but there is Ballantine, &c. one question there which is not so much a question of fact as of legal right.
v. Stevenson. Was David Stevenson entitled to attribute his possession from the date when he sent this instrument to the landlord to the lease itself? I am of opinion that he clearly was, and for this plain reason, that he could not help himself in regard to the obligations undertaken. As far as his brother was concerned, he could no longer remain as his subtenant ; clearly he could not. And with regard to the landlord he was not entitled to say—"My creditor is my brother, and not you." That would never do. The landlord could have compelled David Stevenson to pay the rent for which he had stipulated ; and I have no idea that a landlord can hold a lease over the head of a tenant on these terms with an intention—for I rather think it comes to that—of saying at some time that he may select whether it is more profitable for himself to hold it a concluded bargain or not. But that, however narrowly we scan it, is the position of this case. Mr Bradby, the solicitor in London, admittedly had the power to accept or reject, and he tells us in the plainest terms in his evidence that he retained the lease, which he was bound to have returned at once if it was not to be acted upon, in order to see what would turn up—a profitable view for his client. He says, for instance—"I did not think it proper to cause intimation to be made to the Stevensons that the lease was not to be carried out ; it was better to leave it in abeyance, because it might in the end have been arranged that the lease should be carried out." And therefore there never was a decided resolution not to accept the lease until August 1878. I think that is quite conclusive of the case, for if the landlord did not reject the lease he accepted it. There were not two ways of it, and he did not reject. My own opinion is he never intended to reject. I think Mr Bradby acted upon his own opinion that the lease was a good and profitable lease. That he had trouble with his two clients, who were at law together, is perfectly true ; but if we go through the correspondence I think there are obvious indications that Bradby was not prepared, at least during that year, to take the responsibility of throwing over the respectable tenant he had got.

I shall close the observations I have to make with a few remarks on the correspondence as bearing on the question of rei interventus. On the 4th of January 1876 Mr Rollo writes that the best way would be to see if the Steven-sons (both of them) will retake the farm on a new lease, having it re-valued.
Bradby writes on the 5th February 1876—"Please do what is right according to the respective obligations of the landlord and tenant, and not expending more than is absolutely necessary." Mr Rollo accordingly submits the matter to Mr Stewart for a re-valuation, which he obtains, and he writes that he has got it on the 5th June 1876. He writes again on the 7th September as to Mr Atkins' (the creditor's) power. There he quotes Mr Kinnear's opinion, and says—"I can see no reason why we should not enter into a treaty with Mr Stevenson for a new lease of the subjects." Did Mr Bradby see any reason why they should not enter into a new lease? Not the least. He writes on the 9th September —"We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, enclosing copy of statement laid before counsel, and of his opinion thereon, and which seems satisfactory."

Mr Rollo then proceeded to have the draft prepared. I quite grant that he might have no authority, as agent of the parties, to conclude and make leases of the land, but it is a different matter when it comes to Bradby saying—"Do what you think right and proper;" and Rollo says—"I think it right and proper that there should be a new lease of the subjects;" and Bradby writes in answer—"Your letter is satisfactory." I think a very little adoption by the landlord, or sanction by the landlord in thus acting for him—sanction of things done under an authority of that kind—would be sufficient to validate the transaction and to bind the landlord. And accordingly on the 28th of August Mr Rollo writes—"I now enclose for the signature of Mr Atkins the lease to Mr Stevenson of the farm of The Wood." And there it rests. As I have already said, that, as far as the tenant is concerned, is the lease. No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

Now, it is quite true that two months thereafter, and more, Mr Bradby, who had made no sign whatever up to that time, writes—"Our client thinks he ought not to sign any new lease pending the litigation which has been commenced against him." It is plain, I think, that Mr Bradby's judgment went the other way; but his client had been troublesome. He does not send the lease back to his tenant, however, but writes to his own agent. And accordingly Mr Rollo says—"I have had a conversation with counsel as to the lease;" and he adds that he will be glad to hear from him. Mr Bradby says on the 31st December—"We conclude that you have not agreed to any renewal." How he could conclude that when he had the lease in his hands it is impossible to comprehend. It is perfectly certain that Bradby had Rollo's letter. To allow him to say he did not read it is to allow him to say what no Court of law can take off his hands. We must hold that he read Mr Rollo's letter, and what that letter told him was that the new lease was sent up for signature. It was in vain for him to write four months after—"We conclude you have not agreed to any renewal." If Mr Rollo had power to conclude or to agree to it, he certainly had done so, and Mr Bradby knew that perfectly well. Then he writes on 9th January—"Mr Atkins intended to have the farm, &c., valued before granting any new lease, and will not grant a lease on the old terms." On the 26th February 1878 he says again—"Our client trusts that he is not committed to a renewal of Mr Stevenson's lease." Thus, in his opinion at all events, Mr Rollo might have committed his client, but he hopes he is not committed. Then he writes, again, on the 9th March 1878—"We shall be glad to hear whether the arrangement is obligatory on our client, as he is not desirous of granting a new lease on the present terms;" and in the next letter, dated May 16th, he says—"Will you be so good as to inform us by return of post what is Mr Stevenson's position. We conclude he is now only a tenant at will, or at most a yearly tenant." Then we have Mr Rollo's letter of 17th May, in which he says—"Stevenson having signed the lease and continued in possession, besides making a payment to account of rent, must be considered as the tenant for the duration of the lease."

Now, I have read these things as pointing the effect on the question of rei interventus. Whether the tenant was entitled to attribute possession to the instrument he had signed or not is one thing, but that he did attribute his possession to that instrument—and Mr Bradby for the landlord knew that all the time—was perfectly certain, because these letters of Bradby saying, "I hope there is no bargain with the Stevensons," followed by a letter from Mr Rollo saying, "There is certainly a bargain, and they will hold by it," certiorated Bradby that at all events the tenant and his cautioner were doing what they were entitled to do, and that they were attributing possession to the written instrument. The only other thing I think it necessary to make any remark

No. 171. upon is, that on the 10th of June Bradby says—"With respect to the proposed new lease to Mr Stevenson, our client will not grant it on the old terms, July 15, 1881. should he be disposed to grant it at all. Mr Stevenson should, without delay, Ballantine, &c. v. Stevenson. be made to clearly understand that our client has never agreed to grant him a new lease." Mr Rollo will not stand that, and he says in effect that Mr Bradby was cognisant of all the circumstances, and that long before he let him know the whole facts. After further correspondence upon that matter, in which Mr Rollo explained the position very clearly, Mr Stevenson is informed that there is an objection for the present to sign the lease.

In the last place, there was a payment of rent under the new lease accepted by Mr Rollo, and therefore accepted by the landlord, for Mr Rollo had acted for him. It went into the coffers of the landlord. Bradby at first thought it was not a payment to account of the rent, but there can be no doubt it was.

Now, I am of opinion that as the tenant who signed this lease was himself in possession, he substantially did all that he could—all that a tenant in these circumstances could do—to validate the lease, by acting on the lease, the instrument which he had himself signed. I think the landlord throughout retained, in his own hands, the power of enforcing the lease, which he could only do upon the condition of being a party to it, and merely by refraining from at once throwing it up and returning an obligatory document he is not entitled to say he is not bound.

And I am farther of opinion that the condition of possession necessarily was that the tenant was possessing under the instrument which he had signed as tenant, and that unless he could have got free, if sued by the landlord, on the pretext that he was not—he not knowing whether he had signed it or not—the tenant must be held to have possessed under the lease. The Lord Ordinary thought, and I think rightly thought, that if William Stevenson was the tenant the case would be much more easily disposed of, because it is easier to renew a current lease, and the proof of the renewal is not nearly so stringent as required by law where there is an original lease. That is quite true; but I think the Lord Ordinary has given far too little effect to the fact of the retention of the lease by the landlord—the deliberate and intentional delay on the part of the landlord in making up his mind as to the clear unquestioned view of the tenant, corroborated by Mr Rollo's own statement that the lease was perfectly binding, and that therefore he was possessing under it. I am of opinion that both law and justice require that we should alter this judgment, and that we should give effect to the instrument in question, and assoilzie the tenant from the conclusions of the summons.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in your Lordship's judgment.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I also concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. As has been stated, the case is one of great importance in the law of landlord and tenant, and while I concur in your Lordship's observation that the case is so far peculiar, inasmuch as the lease that was signed by the tenant was kept by the landlord, for the period of a year, without any intimation to the tenant that he was not to consent to that lease, yet I should not be prepared to hold that this is in truth the principle upon which the present case has to be decided.

The pursuer brings his action against the defender Stevenson on the ground that the defender has no right or title to remain for a single day in possession of the lands in question. I think it is obvious that there might have been two defences to this action—one that whether or not the defender was entitled to remain for nineteen years from Martinmas 1876, it was plain that, at least for the year that was current when the action was raised—namely, December 1880—he could not be removed, because his brother had been tenant upon a nineteen years' lease down to Martinmas 1876. David Stevenson had been his brother's subtenant from 1867, and he continued in possession after the expiry of the lease for nineteen years at Martinmas 1876. It would be in vain therefore for the pursuer to say that David Stevenson, who had paid rent to the landlord as his brother's subtenant not only prior to Martinmas 1876, but subsequent to that time, in respect of possession down to Martinmas 1876, could be dealt with by the landlord as one who was in possession without any right or title granted by the landlord.

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

The main defence, however—and the only one in principle with reference to which there has been any contention between the parties—is this, that at the time of the action the defender was entitled, by virtue of a right which was granted to him, to continue in possession, not only till the close of the year then current, but that he was entitled, in virtue of that which he said was a lease affecting the landlord, and from the obligations of which the landlord could not escape, to remain in possession, as tenant, for a period of, nineteen years.

Now, it was incumbent on the defender maintaining that defence to shew that he had a written title, for consent given in any other way than writing would not be a consent sufficient to establish the liability of the defender's antagonist. The defender accordingly produces, as his title, a written lease, which he says was granted to him, and which he signed as tenant, and which his brother signed as his cautioner. He also says that after the lease had been so signed it was transmitted to the landlord and retained by him for a year without any objection being offered to its terms, and more than that, that in the interval between the time when the lease was transmitted to the landlord, and the time when the landlord intimated an intended repudiation, the lease had been acted upon by both parties, and for that reason had become as obligatory against the landlord as it was obligatory against the tenant, in respect the landlord had taken benefit from the lease, and in respect further that the tenant had fulfilled his obligation under the lease.

Now, it is upon the construction of the evidence affecting this question that I have come to the conclusion that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied.

That those who represented the landlord here were in default in the way in which they dealt with the lease after it had been transmitted in August 1877, is, I think, a view in which all will agree. The conduct of the London solicitors who acted as agents for Mr Atkins was not only inconsistent with the ordinary principles and practice of men of business, but, I think, was in the last degree discourteous to those with whom the transaction was to be concluded, and was a course which might have wrought difficulties by which serious results might have been incurred. But I am not prepared to hold that though this lease had been signed for a long time, if nothing had been done by the landlord which could be described as homologation, and if nothing had been done by the tenant which could be described as rei interventus, the landlord would have been bound. No doubt it was a strange thing—all the stranger because his conduct might give rise to misapprehension—that he should keep the lease, and should remain as

No. 171. it were uncommitted for this long period. If the tenant was anxious on the subject, as he ought to have been I think, then the course for him to have followed was to have categorically inquired whether the lease had been signed or not, or whether it was to be signed or not, and if he did not receive satisfactory intimation to the effect that the lease was to be accepted, then he could have declared that by his signature to the proposed lease he would not be any longer bound. But the tenant acquiesced in the situation of affairs, and did not put it to the landlord that he should declare his purpose; and so it came to pass that in August 1878, one full year after the lease had been delivered signed by the tenant to the agent of the landlord, there was given to the tenant an intimation that the landlord would not sign the lease which had so long before been transmitted for his signature. If anything had occurred in the interval, it might have been, no doubt, matter of great hardship to the tenant, but the tenant would have been in default as to his own duty for his own protection. If he sent in the lease to be signed by the landlord, it was his duty in a reasonable time to inquire whether that had or had not been done, by which the obligation of the landlord would unquestionably have been established. According to my reading of the authorities this is the true view of the law. It is not mere lapse of time that will suffice to make up an equivalent for the necessity of signing so as to complete the contract. It is the acceptance of the one party, or of both parties, or the performance by them of what is equivalent to acceptance. What is equivalent is this—where one of the parties takes benefit from the proposed contract, and where another party has fulfilled some obligation which was incumbent upon him only if the contract were a completed contract; and if this last is done with the knowledge, and presumably with the consent, of the other party to the contract, then both are bound. When once it is reduced to this, that both parties act as if the contract were completed, then both are bound by that as a completed contract.

Now, with regard to the question whether or not there was that done here which was equivalent, as regards the obligation of the parties, to the signature of both parties to the contract, my own opinion is that the Lord Ordinary has misapprehended the import of the evidence. I agree with him in thinking that in regard to any possession following upon this it could not be said there was possession given to David Stevenson upon his contract. See how the matter stood in August 1877, when the contract was signed by David Stevenson and his brother as cautioner and then sent to the agents in London. At that time the contract had not been concluded; both parties had not concluded it. It was signed by the tenant, who previously to that signature was under no obligation to continue. Then, what passed at the term of Martinmas 1877? It was sent to the landlord for his signature, and if he had intimated he was not to sign he would not have been precluded from giving warning to the tenant to remove at the ensuing term of Martinmas. But at this time Stevenson was in possession under that tacit relocation which had for some time existed. Things were allowed to remain as they were after the expiry of the former lease for nineteen years. The tacit relocation was William's title—his principal title—and it was also David's principal title as subtenant. This was the state of matters down to Martinmas 1876—down to the signing of the lease by the tenant—and also I think, from that time onwards until the time when the landlord became bound. Consequently up till that time, I think that the possession which was enjoyed by the tenant was not possession under the new lease so much as possession attributable to the previous title, namely, the title originally granted, the lease for nineteen years, continued, as it was, by tacit relocation. It is perfectly true that, if the parties became bound by the lease, the lease became the title of possession—aye, and more than that, that retrospectively, as between the parties, the tenants were to be held as having possessed from the term of entry specified in the lease, namely, Martinmas 1876. But it is only after the new lease becomes operative against one of the parties that we find there is a change upon the title of possession deducible from the contract, which has become obligatory by that time.

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.

Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

Now, the Lord Ordinary finds, in the first place, that there was no change of possession. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in that. But he finds, in the second place, "in point of fact he did not pay the increased rent, at all events until some time after he had been informed that the new lease had been repudiated by Mr Atkins." Now, I think, in the first place, he is wrong when he categorically finds there was no payment of increased rent. I think he is also wrong in saying that if increased rent had been paid at any time, it was not paid until after intimation was given to the tenant that the landlord was not to be held bound by the lease. According to the evidence, which I shall endeavour to look at as briefly as I can, I think there was payment of increased rent—that is, rent, the payment of which was obligatory only if the lease was operative; and I further think that rent was paid by the tenant, and the payment was accepted by the representative of the landlord, Mr Rollo, and by those who represented the landlord in London, namely, Bradby & Robins, before any intimation had been given to the tenant that the landlord was not to be bound.

Your Lordship has gone over the earlier portion of the proof on this matter, and I do not think it is necessary to go over the field which has been already traversed. As regards the parole testimony, there is a conflict between Mr Rollo and Mr Bradby, but I think the testimony of the two is to be reconciled in this way, that Bradby is not speaking for or of all those who may be members of his firm. He is speaking of that only which falls within his own individual knowledge.

If his testimony is to be taken as meaning this, that there was nothing paid in the way of increased rent up till August 1878, then I think he was committing himself to an opinion entirely inconsistent with that which is established in the correspondence which passed betwixt himself and Mr Rollo.

The term when this payment of rent was made as payment of increased rent is reached only inferentially; but I think we have evidence in the letter of 17th of May 1878 that the payment must have been made earlier than that, because on that date Mr Rollo says to Bradby & Robins—"Stevenson having signed the lease and continued in possession, besides making a payment to account of rent, must be considered as the tenant for the duration of the lease." Two things are there set forth, first the signing of the lease, and in the next place the payment of the rent. He does not there say "increased rent," but it is plain it must have been increased rent that was referred to, because unless the payment was connected with the lease which had been signed then the value of the payment as doing that which was required, in the absence of the landlord's signature, to complete the contract would have been very small indeed, and would not have been referred to by Mr Rollo as one of the things which established the tenant's position.

That was on the 17th of May, and what we find resulting from that is this,

No. 171. that on the 1st of August Messrs Bradby & Robins write to Mr Rollo—"We have submitted to our client the correspondence which has passed between you and us relative to the granting of a new lease to Mr Stevenson, and our client instructs us that he declines to grant such lease without having considered and approved of terms. We shall be glad to receive a statement of account and remittance, as our client has again called our attention to the lapse of time since he has had an account or remittance." That is on the 1st of August, and on the 5th of the same month Mr Rollo replies—"I have your note of the 1st, and can only refer to the correspondence as to the terms of the lease with Stevenson. I now enclose my account to 31st December last, and also one bringing it down for the half year to 30th June, in which I have given effect to the increased rents, the balance on hand being £471, 9s. 8d., subject, of course, to the account of expenses in the litigation." Here is a distinct intimation given by Mr Rollo, who represented the landlord, that increased rent had been paid by the tenant, and paid by the tenant to him, and further than that, that credit was given to the landlord in the account which was then transmitted for those increased rents. And what do Bradby & Robins say on the 6th of the same month of August—"With respect to Mr Stevenson's rent, it appears that the increased rent proposed to be paid by him has not really been paid at all. We are glad to find that our client has not therefore been compromised by the acceptance of increased rent as upon a supposed agreement for a new lease. Mr Stevenson should be informed of our client's decision at once." He thought it was high time then. He was alarmed a little that Mr Rollo had made the communication to the effect that an increased rent had been paid, and that the sum for which Mr Rollo rendered the account was a sum for increased rent from Stevenson, but he seems to have satisfied himself somehow that upon a readjustment of the account nothing had been paid on account of increased rent, and so he writes to Mr Rollo in the terms I have mentioned, and very much to his own relief seemingly, for he makes Mr Rollo aware of what would have been the consequence of payment of increased rent—the compromising of the landlord—compromising him in this way, that while he was proposing to repudiate the lease his agent was taking rent at the same time to which he would only be entitled if he was to be bound by the lease which the tenant had signed, and under which he was paying.

Mr Rollo answered on the following day, August 7—"I am favoured with your letter of yesterday's date. You are under a misapprehension in supposing that the increased rent by David Stevenson has not been paid, for although there is an arrear of £12, 4s. 1d. as at 30th June, he has paid for the whole year £258, whereas the old rent as paid by his brother would only have been £250, irrespective of the fact that he is in possession and signed the lease which was sent to you on the 28th of August 1877." And the question is not whether it was much or little. That is not the question at all. The question is, whether there was an amount of rent due and paid, and paid only if the lease was to be looked upon as obligatory both upon landlord and tenant! Mr Rollo accordingly told him that there had been this payment. Then upon the 13th of August Bradby & Robins write to Mr Rollo to this effect,—and I refer to this, because it seems to me to be conclusive, in the first place, of the fact that there had been at that date increased rent paid, and, in the next place, that this had been a fact which, prior to any repudiation, came to the knowledge of Bradby & Robins. What they write on the 13th of August is this—

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 7th inst. We appear to have looked No. 171. at the wrong account in reference to the payment of the increased rent. However, it appears, on carefully looking at the accounts, that no part of the increased rent was received until long after our client had intimated his intention not to grant a new lease, and we had communicated this to you." It is not pretended that the demand had been made before, that any communication should be made to the tenant; Mr Bradby could hardly have written to that effect, because the last sentence of his letter of 6th August is—"Mr Stevenson should be informed of our client's decision at once." So it was the fact, that this payment of increased rent had been made months before. But in this letter of 13th August Mr Bradby does not contemplate that the payment of increased rent, which he now admits had been made, was a payment that was made by the tenant and received by the landlord before there was any intimation to the tenant of an intention to repudiate. No doubt the letters to which your Lordship referred passed between Bradby & Robins and Rollo, but that amounted to no more than this, that the landlord was communicating with himself or his own agents. He might say anything he chose in that way as regarded his intentions; but if these intentions were concealed from the tenant, and if the tenant was left to suppose that he was under an obligation to pay, and paid rent under a sense of this obligation, and if the amount which was paid was received by the landlord just as if it had been due under a lease to which he, the landlord, put his name, the landlord could not turn round on the tenant and say, "I am not bound by this, because I have not signed"; such conduct at once shews that he looked on the contract as concluded; and the landlord, in receiving what was offered, received that which was the same as he would have received had the landlord in the interval put his name to the same paper which the tenant signed.

Upon these grounds I entirely concur with your Lordships, and am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled.

LORD YOUNG.—I should, if your Lordships will allow me, like to say a word or two on one or two questions that have been referred to in the course of your Lordships' observations, and specially in regard to the position of William Stevenson in this matter, which I think has been somewhat misapprehended by the Lord Ordinary. This action is not directed against William Stevenson at all. He is no party to it, and the lease of 1877—I mean the deed which he signs as a cautioner for his brother David—is ignored and repudiated by the pursuer altogether. And so William Stevenson is not called as a party to any deed, nor is he called as a party possessing the farm by tacit relocation. In short, he is not here. It has been assumed that he possessed by tacit relocation after Martinmas 1876; but he is not here.

Jameson, for the pursuers.—There was an action raised against him in the Sheriff Court, in which he put in defences to the effect that he had no title to the farm. The action was directed against him in the Sheriff Court on the footing that he was still in possession of the farm.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Is that referred to on the record?

LORD YOUNG.—It has not been noticed here.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—You say he continued to possess?

Jameson.—Yes.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

No. 171. LORD YOUNG.—What is the date of the Sheriff Court action.

July 15, 1881. Jamieson.—20th September 1880.

Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—That is three months before this action?

Jamieson.—Yes.

LORD YOUNG.—Then the landlord maintained at that time tacit relocation with William Stevenson, and put an end to it, or brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Ayr to put an end to it, in 1880. Now, it appears to me that there is no room whatever, and never was any room, for tacit relocation with William Stevenson. I quite assume, with your Lordship, that Mr Rollo's agency did not include a power to let on leases. But he was the landlord's agent, and the landlord's agent in this country for the management of his property and to look after his tenants, and his knowledge of the true state of matters at any time was the landlord's knowledge. The landlord was abroad. Perhaps I am speaking with undue strictness; but what I mean is, he was not in Scotland, and, like other sensible landlords, he appointed an agent upon the spot, and although that agent had no power to let leases, he had power to know, and it was his duty to know, the state of matters at each of the farms, and his knowledge was, I do not say for all purposes, but for most purposes, the knowledge of the landlord.

Now, what was the state of matters at this farm? The lease that expired at Martinmas 1876 was indeed to William Stevenson. Ten years before its expiry William sublet the farm to his brother David, and he himself removed from it. Even if there had been no arrangement with Mr Rollo, the landlord's representative, on the subject, I should assume that he was aware of that fact, which he had acted upon for ten years. But he was aware of it. For William, before subletting the farm to David, went to Mr Rollo, and arranged that it should be permitted, and it was accordingly done. William went away, and put David in his place, with Mr Rollo's knowledge and consent. Now, his knowledge was the landlord's knowledge—it must be imputed to the landlord for knowledge in such a matter. And even if he had not the landlord's authority to consent to a sublet—if there was no notice taken of it for ten years—the landlord would be too late to object that his agent had done an unauthorised thing.

Therefore the position of matters as regards the years prior to Martinmas 1876 was that the landlord knew that William was away from the farm. He might have been out of the country, but there was no doubt about his being away from the farm. And there was thus no room whatever for a tacit relocation with him in point of fact. Tacit relocation is an agreement which the law on reasonably good grounds imputes to the parties as a real agreement between them. Mr Hunter, in his well-known work, says:—"Tacit relocation is a presumed renovation of the lease for an ensuing year upon the same terms as those of the preceding year, operating under a lease, either verbal or written, and arising from the implied consent of the parties, when neither the lessor warns the lessee to remove nor the lessee renounces in due time." Now, there is no room for such an implied assent with respect to William, and if, say in 1877 or 1878, the landlord—allowing David to remain, and knowing that William was away—had brought an action against William for the rent on the ground of an implied lease with him—William being then in England or anywhere else—I should say his answer would have been conclusive—"There was no room for tacit relocation with me; you knew I had sublet to my brother, and I was away from the farm, and you could never have imagined for a moment—there was no room to imply it—that there was in respect of my silence a renewed lease by me.”

No. 171.

July 15, 1881.
Ballantine, &c.
v. Stevenson.

But the importance of that is, that putting (as it does put) William out of the case altogether, it brings the question with the landlord to David, who alone is sued here. Now, what was his title to possess after William's lease terminated? William's lease certainly terminated, and was certainly not renewed by tacit relocation, if what I have said be right. Then what was David's title of possession? All parties were alive to the necessity of giving him a title, and accordingly he applied to have a lease granted to him. Mr Rollo, although he had no power to grant such a lease, had the knowledge of his (David's) possession, and knew that he was actually in possession of the farm and cultivating it, and that William was out of possession, and Mr Rollo having that knowledge had the power to communicate these facts to his constituents or to call their attention to them. His knowledge of the state of the facts would be their knowledge. He does direct their attention to the matter, and says—"It will be proper to negotiate a lease with David. He is a very respectable man, and his brother William, who is out of possession, will be cautioner for the rent." Well, the negotiations with David are before the expiry of William's lease, Mr Rollo concludes the negotiations with him subject to the landlord's approval, has the farm valued, gets David to agree to the increased rent according to the valuation, and gets him also to request William to agree to give his obligation as a cautioner. The footing of possession is thus arranged. David possesses upon that footing, or he has no title of possession at all. No doubt Mr Rollo having no power to let, the landlord, when what Mr Rollo had provisionally arranged was brought under his notice, might have said—"No, I don't agree to that, and David must go."

But the landlord was bound to take his course. He was bound to do something if he did mean to repudiate. The thing had been arranged and negotiated provisionally as to the title of a man who had no other title of possession at all, and a landlord is not entitled just to fold his hands and say—"Well, I am just keeping my hand upon the lease and letting things slide to see what comes of it." That is not a position which anybody is entitled to take.

But the importance of any remarks that I have to make, if they be well founded otherwise, is that from the first this lease was David's title of possession—that it is to mistake the case altogether to say that there was a current lease as by tacit relocation with William, for he was a tenant no longer. I think there was no tacit relocation, and that the negotiations between Rollo, as representing the landlord, and David, were upon that footing.

I make these observations in addition to what your Lordship has said, and what Lord Craighill concurs in, as to the grounds of judgment otherwise, which I think are sufficient per se.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against; assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

J. A. CAMPBELL & LAMOND, C.S.—W. G. L. WINCHESTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 172.

THOMAS BAIRD, Pursuer.—Strachan.
WILLIAM CORNELIUS, Defender.—Lang.

July 16, 1881.
Baird v.
Cornelius.

Process—Jury Trial—Abandonment by not proceeding to trial within twelve months of issues being adjusted—Question, Whether A. S., Feb. 16, 1841, sec. 46, is still applicable—13 and 14 Vict. c. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 40.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.

In this action issues were adjusted on 16th May 1880, and the case was set down for trial on 16th July 1880. On 8th July the order for trial was discharged, by reason of the Lord Ordinary who was to preside at the trial being required to attend the trial of an election petition in the country. No step was taken in the case by either party until 14th July 1881, when the defender gave notice of a motion that in terms of the 46th section of A. S., Feb. 16, 1841,* the pursuer should be held as confessed, in respect he had not proceeded to trial within twelve months from the adjustment of issues, and that decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

The pursuer then, on 15th July 1881, gave notice of trial for the next Christmas sittings.

The Lord Ordinary, according to the practice under the A. S., Feb. 16, 1841, reported the motion for absolvitor to the Second Division. At the same time the pursuer moved the Court to fix a day for trial in terms of his notice.

The defender maintained that the Act of Sederunt was still in force, notwithstanding the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1850, as to jury trials, and that it had received effect in Wilson v. Haggart,¹ and other cases since the passing of that Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Act of Sederunt is not applicable in the present case, where the trial was not postponed by the pursuer countermanding his notice for trial, but by reason of the engagements of the Judge. How far the Act of Sederunt may be applicable nowadays in other cases I do not think it necessary to decide. But the 40th section of the Act of 1850 has introduced a considerable change by abolishing the system of leads in jury trials, and giving either party the right to move the Lord Ordinary to appoint a time and place for the trial of the issue. The defender therefore suffers no prejudice by the pursuer's supineness, because he is not now prevented by the pursuer's lead from getting the case enrolled with a view to trial. I am clear that there is no reason why we should not proceed to fix a day for trial.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

JAMES BARTON, S.S.C.—J. & W. C. MURRAY, W.S.—Agents.

No. 173.

LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN COUNCIL OF EDINBURGH (Locality of St Cuthbert's), Petitioners.—Mackay.

July 18, 1881.
Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh (Locality of St Cuthbert's).

Teinds—Process—Citation—A.S., July 5, 1809.—A rectified scheme of the locality of St Cuthbert's parish, Edinburgh, having been approved as

* A. S., Feb. 16, 1841, sec. 46, provides "that if it shall be made to appear to the Court that a party has abandoned his suit, or if the pursuer, or party appointed to stand as pursuer, shall not proceed to trial within twelve months after issues have been finally engrossed and signed, the Court shall proceed therein as in cases in which parties are held as confessed, unless sufficient cause be shewn for the delay to the satisfaction of the Court."

¹ July 15, 1863, 1 Macph. 1115, 35 Scot. Jur. 666.

TEIND COURT.
Teind Clerk.

final, the Lord Ordinary approved of the Auditor's report, and decerned No. 173. for expenses. After extract had been issued it was discovered by the teind-clerk that certain lands belonging to the city of Edinburgh had been entered and localled upon twice under different classifications. The Lord Provost and Magistrates, when this error was discovered, prepared a summons of reduction of the said final decree of locality, and, as preliminary to raising the action, petitioned the Court to dispense with the ordinary mode of citation of the heritors of the parish (1075 in number), on the ground of expense, and instead thereof to allow citation by means of notice given in the kirk by the precentor, written notice on the kirk door, and subsequent newspaper advertisements in the manner prescribed by the Act of Sederunt July 5, 1809, for the raising of actions of augmentation. The expenses of citation in the ordinary way were estimated at about £250, besides agent's fees and other expenses. The Court, in the circumstances, granted the prayer of the petition.

W. WHITE-MILLAR, S.S.C.—Agent.

GEORGE B. M. WYSE, Petitioner.—Robertson—Darling.

No. 174.

Mrs E. F. WATSON OR ABBOTT AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Jameson.

Trust—Assumption of new trustees.—In a trust which consisted of three trustees, two of them, as a quorum, executed a deed of assumption of two additional trustees without giving any notice to their co-trustee. Held that the deed of assumption was invalid. July 19, 1881. Wyse v. Abbott, &c.

MR GEORGE B. M. WYSE, Mr Cranfield W. J. Abbott, and Dr R. T. 1ST DIVISION. Abbott, were, in November 1880, the acting trustees under the settlement of the late Mrs E. Cranfield or Abbott. C.

On 18th and 20th November 1880, Mr Abbott and Dr Abbott, as a majority and quorum of the trustees, executed a deed of assumption, whereby they assumed as additional trustees Mr Abbott's wife, Mrs Elizabeth Fraser Watson or Abbott, and Mr Robert Macdonald, S.S.C., a member of the firm of Boyd, Macdonald, & Co., who acted as law-agents of the trust. No notice of the intention to make the appointment was given to the other trustee, Mr Wyse, and he did not know of it till about six months after. The reason alleged for not giving him notice was that he had refused to sign a transfer of stock which was necessary for the conduct of the trust, and was not on friendly terms with his co-trustee, Mr Abbott.

Mr Abbott resigned his office of trustee on 7th March 1881, and Dr Abbott died on 11th April 1881.

Mr Wyse, who maintained that the assumption of Mrs Abbott and Mr Macdonald was ineffectual, and that he was the sole trustee, presented this petition, praying the Court to find that Mrs Abbott and Mr Macdonald "are not, and never have been, trustees and executors" of the late Mrs Abbott, or otherwise to remove them from their offices; and further, for the appointment of a judicial factor on the trust-estate, and upon such appointment being made, to find that the petitioner was entitled to resign, and that upon his accounting for his intromissions he was entitled to a discharge.

Mrs Abbott and Mr Macdonald lodged answers, in which they stated the disputes which had arisen between Mr Wyse and his co-trustees, and maintained that under the Acts 24 and 25 Vict. c. 84, sec. 1, and 30 and 31 Vict. c. 97, sec. 11, a quorum of trustees were vested with the power of assuming new trustees.

Argued for the petitioner;—Although a quorum of trustees might assume new trustees they were bound to give notice to their co-trustee of their

No. 174. intention to do so. Such a trust act could not be effectually done behind the back of one of the trustees.¹

July 19, 1881.

Wyse v.
Abbott, &c.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In November 1880 the trustees upon this estate consisted of Mr Abbott, Dr Abbott, and Mr Wyse. At that time two of the three, viz Mr Abbott and Dr Abbott, executed a deed by which they assumed two persons as additional trustees, and afterwards Mr Abbott resigned. The result was intended to be that the trust should consist of four persons, viz Mr Abbott's wife, and Mr Macdonald, the law-agent of the trustees, Dr Abbott and Mr Wyse. Dr Abbott died, and thereafter the trust was intended to consist of three persons. Now, all this was brought about by the execution of a deed of assumption in November 1880 without any intimation to Mr Wyse, and without its being brought to his knowledge till six months after. The question we have now to decide is whether this is a good nomination, and I have no doubt that it is bad. No two trustees can do a trust act without consultation with their co-trustee. It is of the essence of the duty of a body of trustees that they should meet and exchange views on the trust affairs. The trustees were bound to see that Mr Wyse had notice of their intention to nominate co-trustees, and an opportunity of stating his views. Their excuse was that he had been disagreeable, and had refused to sign a deed of transfer. That rendered it more imperative that he should have an opportunity of stating his views. The omission of notice, and the want of consultation, are enough to make the appointment illegal. The case cited by Mr Robertson may, with great advantage, be referred to as of universal application. The report bears,—“At advising, it was observed by some of their Lordships, that in the administration of the trust, and especially in the exercise of so important a power as assuming new trustees, it was essential that the utmost fairness and openness should be observed towards each other, that ample time and opportunity for deliberation should be afforded, and that if any concealment or underhand dealing, or any misleading or deception, in order to carry a measure by surprise should appear, the Court, as a Court of equity, would be entitled and bound to control and restrain trustees in such abuse of their powers.” This seems to me directly applicable to the present case. If the consequence be that the trust cannot go on because Mr Wyse is the sole trustee, and he does not desire to act because some of the parties connected with the trust have not confidence in him, the only remedy seems to be the appointment of a judicial factor. It is suggested that such an appointment would be a heavy burden on the trust. That may be avoided if the parties can agree; but failing their agreeing, I fear there is no other course but the appointment of a factor.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Find that the respondents have not been validly assumed as trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Mrs E. Cranfield or Abbott; nominate and appoint Mr Robert Cameron Cowan, C.A., to be judicial factor on the estate of the said deceased Mrs E. Cranfield or Abbott, with the usual powers, he finding caution before extract, and decern: Find the respondents liable in expenses hitherto incurred by the petitioner, allow an account,” &c.

H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—J. H. JAMESON, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Reid v. Maxwell, Feb. 6, 1852, 14 D. 449, 23 Scot. Jur. 606.

DAVID P. MACDONALD, Petitioner.—C. S. Dickson.
 MRS MARY HUME OR MACDONALD, Respondent.—Baxter.

No. 175.

July 19, 1881.

Process—Petition—Restriction of Aliment.—It is competent for a person Macdonald v. against whom a decree for aliment has been pronounced to present a petition Macdonald. praying the Court to restrict the amount of future aliment.

THIS was a petition by David P. Macdonald, tailor, Glasgow. On 1st 1st Division. September 1876 his wife had obtained decree of separation and aliment B. at the rate of £40 a-year.

The petitioner stated that his business was in a depressed condition, and that he was unable to pay aliment at the rate of £40, and that, in respect of his failure to pay, his wife had caused him to be imprisoned in Glasgow prison.

The prayer of his petition was "to allow the petitioner a proof of his averments if that should be found necessary, and to restrict the aliment to be paid by the petitioner to his said wife to £15 per annum as from and after Whitsunday last, and to find that the petitioner is only bound to pay aliment at said rate as from and after Whitsunday last, and to grant warrant for liberating the petitioner, reserving right to the petitioner or his said wife to apply to the Court to alter the rate of aliment if any change of circumstance should supervene; and to find the said Mrs M. Hume or Macdonald liable in expenses in the event of her appearing to oppose the prayer hereof; or otherwise to order the Deputy Clerk Register, or other custodier thereof, to transmit the process in said action of separation to the clerk at Lord Rutherford Clark's bar, and to remit this petition to Lord Rutherford Clark to proceed further herein as may be just, and meantime to grant interim warrant of liberation, and to decern, or to do otherwise," &c.

Mrs Macdonald lodged answers, and stated that her husband was able to pay aliment at the rate of £40.

LORD PRESIDENT.—At first I had some doubts as to the competency of the present proceeding. It is undoubtedly the practice to proceed by way of suspension of a decree for aliment, but in the old case of Maclachlan v. Campbell, May 25, 1809, F.C., the question was raised whether a petition was not the proper form. In that case a wife used caption against her husband for arrears of aliment. He presented a bill of suspension, which was refused on the merits. The report bears,—“The petitioner likewise pleaded that his funds had turned out much less than was supposed at the time of modifying the aliment, and that he was unable to pay it. The Court did not think that that appeared from his statement, and, besides, were of opinion that it could not competently be pleaded as a ground of suspension to an ordinary in the Bill-Chamber, but that it should have been brought forward by a petition to the whole Court, which it was open to the suspender to give in, since the decree of aliment was only in hoc statu.” Every decree for aliment is only granted in hoc statu. I am therefore happy to come to the conclusion that the present petition is a competent proceeding.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE respondent having consented to interim liberation on caution the following interlocutor was pronounced:—“In respect of the bond of caution now lodged, grant interim liberation of the petitioner, as craved, and decern; and remit to John C. Reid to examine into the circumstances of the parties, and report.”

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—ANDREW FLEMING, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 176.

July 19, 1881.
Boswell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

ALEXANDER BOSWELL Junior, Appellant.—Pearson—Dickson.
THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF EDINBURGH, Respondents.—Trayner—Mackay.

Property, restraints on use of—Questions between proprietors of flats—Servitude—Light and air.—A lot of building ground, extending from the street in front to a meuse lane at the back, having been feued out, the feuar erected on it a tenement, consisting of a main-door house and two flats and attics opening from the common stair. He afterwards sold part of the house, “consisting of the ground and street storeys of the tenement lately erected” by him, “with the area at the back of the said tenement,” &c. to one purchaser, and the common stair houses, with certain rights in the cellarage and front area, but with no express right to or in “the area at the back of the said tenement,” to others.

The proprietor of the street and sunk floor, having converted them into a shop, proposed to extend his premises by building a saloon the height of his street floor terminating in a building at the back facing the meuse lane, and rising to a height of 19 feet 9 inches at the ridge of the roof, and 8 feet 9 inches at the wall head above the level of the top of his street floor. This building was to be brought within 21 feet 6 inches of the back wall of the street floor and of the common stair floors above.

Held that there was no limitation on the right of the proprietor of the street floor and back area, and, as no injurious diminution of light and air to the flats above was to be apprehended, warrant granted subject to conditions.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild
Court, Edinburgh.
I.

ALEXANDER BOSWELL junior, portmanteau and trunk manufacturer, was proprietor of the street and sunk flat of the tenement No. 8 Hanover Street, Edinburgh, and of the back ground and buildings behind the same. The Magistrates of Edinburgh were proprietors of the second, third, and attic storeys, being the remainder of the same tenement, access to which was obtained by what was formerly the common stair No. 10 Hanover Street. The second storey was occupied as the Lands Valuation Office of the City of Edinburgh.

The ground on which these whole subjects were built had been feued out in 1784 by the city of Edinburgh to John Sutter, and in 1786 the Magistrates granted to his trustees a feu-disposition, in which it was described as “All and Whole the before-mentioned piece of ground within the extended royalty of the city of Edinburgh, on the west front line of Hanover Street, measuring 47 feet 8 inches in front, and marked on the feuing-plan letters I I, whereon there is now built a house consisting of four storeys and garrets, bounded, the said piece of ground and house, on the north by the said Richard Cockburn’s feu, on the south by a house built by the said Claud Cleghorn, on the east by Hanover Street, and on the west by the meuse lane, with the cellarage now made on the front of the said house and communication with the common sewers.”

The tenement built by Sutter was originally a common stair tenement of the kind ordinarily met with in Edinburgh. It consisted of a street and sunk storey forming the main-door house No. 8 Hanover Street, and of the second, third, and attic storeys, each storey forming a separate house, and opening off the common stair No. 10 Hanover Street.

Sutter’s trustees sold the main-door house and the three flats above to four separate purchasers.

The main-door house, being the subjects afterwards acquired by Alexander Boswell junior, were described as “All and Hail that house presently possessed by the said Andrew Blane, consisting of the ground and street storeys of the tenement lately erected by the said deceased John Sutter on the piece of ground after-mentioned, with the area at the back of the said tenement, and pump-well therein, together with the sunk area, and three cellars under the pavement opposite to the front of the said tenement, to the south of the division wall in said area, communication with the common sewers, free access to the roof by the common stair and common service window, and whole pertinents, the said Andrew Blane and his foresaids being always bound to maintain and uphold upon their own expenses the arches of the cellarage and communication with the common sewers, and also the pavement covering the same and railing thereon; but they are to have no concern with upholding the roof, common stair, or service window above-mentioned, which buildings hereby disposed and others were lately erected and formed by the said deceased John Sutter on that piece of ground," &c.

No. 176.
July 19, 1881.
Boswell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The second storey was described as "All and Whole that lodging or dwelling-house, consisting of four fire-rooms, kitchen, lobby, pantry, closets, and other conveniences, being the third storey or second storey above the ground flat of that tenement of land on the west side of South Hanover Street, lately built by the said John Sutter upon that piece of ground," &c., "together with the northmost cellar of the three cellars in the north division below the pavement in the front area of the said tenement, with an equal share and privilege of the office-house to be built in the said front area below the fore stair leading to the common stair of the said tenement, along with the two upper flats thereof, to which the possessor of each flat shall have a key, and which is to be built and upheld at their joint expense, and with the benefit of the common water-pipe in the said front area, and communication with the common sewers, and also the pavement covering the same, with free ish and entry to the said lodging, and access by the common passage or stair to the roof and chimney-tops for the purpose of sweeping the vents or other necessary occasions; and also with free ish and entry to the said cellar, water-pipe, and office-house by the common stair of said tenement, and by the stair leading to the sunk area in the front thereof: The said Robert Pitcairn and his foresaids to be at the whole expense of upholding the arch of the said cellar, and at the joint and proportional expense effeiring to his feu-duty with the other proprietors of the said tenement in upholding the water-pipe and the communication with the common sewers, the pavement, common stair, and iron railing on the front of said tenement, but to be at no part of the expense of upholding the roof of the said tenement, which is to be upheld and supported by the proprietor of the garret storey of said tenement."

The third and attic storeys were conveyed in similar terms mutatis mutandis. And all the common stair portion of the buildings was subsequently acquired by the Magistrates as above-mentioned.

Boswell, who had converted the main-door part of the tenement into a shop, proposed, in 1879, to extend his premises by building out a saloon to the back the full height of his street floor, and terminating in a building of considerable height fronting the meuse lane, which was the boundary of the back ground to the west.

The proposed erections were objected to by the Magistrates as proprietors of the flats, and the Dean of Guild refused his warrant. The case was taken by appeal to the Second Division, who sustained the Dean of Guild's judgment. The nature of the buildings then proposed will be best seen from a report made by the Dean of Guild on 6th July 1880 under a remit by the Second Division,—

"The building in question is proposed to be erected only about 21 feet distant from the windows of the property of the respondents, the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council, is to extend along the whole

No. 176. length of the said property, and is to be built to the height (measuring to the eaves) of 18 feet above the level of the sills of the windows of the lowest flat of the said respondents' property, which is occupied as the Lands Valuation Office, and to the height of 6 feet above the level of the sills of the windows of the respondents' flat immediately above the said offices.

July 19, 1881.
Boswell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

"A back building similar to that proposed to be erected by the appellant has been erected on the back ground immediately to the north of his back ground. This building is of the same height as the appellant's proposed building, and is the same distance from the back windows of the tenement in front of it as the appellant's proposed erection is from the said respondents' property.

"The Court inspected the back rooms in the said front tenement which are on the same level as the Lands Valuation Offices, and found that the said back building materially interferes with the access of light thereto.

"On these grounds the Dean of Guild and his Council have to report that the appellant's proposed erection on his back ground will have the effect of materially interfering with access of light to the said respondents' property, and that the said lowest flat of the respondents' property in particular will be materially affected thereby."

Boswell having modified his plans, again applied in December 1880 to the Dean of Guild for his warrant.

His application was again opposed by the Magistrates, on the ground, as stated in their pleas—1. The petitioner is not entitled to the warrant craved, in respect (1) that his proposed alterations are not sanctioned by the petitioner's titles, and are an infringement of the rights of the respondents as conterminous proprietors; (2) that the height to which the petitioner intends to increase his property exceeds the limits prescribed by the Police Act of 1879. 2. The petitioner is not entitled after the decision in the previous application to have warrant granted to increase the height of the buildings on the back ground to an extent which will interfere materially with the access of light to the respondents' property; and as the plans now proposed would have that effect the present application ought to be refused. 3. Separatim, in no view is the petitioner entitled to build on the back area, in which the proprietors of the main or front tenement have an interest, to a greater height than the level of his own property.

The proposed buildings are thus described in the Dean of Guild's interlocutor:—"On the back area there is proposed to be built by the petitioner, immediately behind the petitioner's street storey, a saloon, extending backwards to the meuse lane; at a distance of 21 feet 6 inches from the back wall of the petitioner's street flat, and the flat belonging to the City of Edinburgh, there is to be erected over the said saloon an addition of a first floor and attic floor 19 feet 9 inches higher at the ridge of the roof and 8 feet 9 inches higher at the wall head than the top of the petitioner's street storey; the saloon, in so far as between the main tenement and the said additional floors, is to be lighted by a cupola, rising about 3 feet above the petitioner's street flat; the sill of the back windows of the respondent's said flat is about 3 feet above the petitioner's flat, and the windows are 7 feet in height."

The Dean of Guild, on 17th February 1881, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds . . . that, in the opinion of the Court, the proposed new buildings would not materially interfere with the light or air of the respondents' said flat; that the proposed buildings being of a greater height than the street storey belonging to the petitioner, the said respondents would be thereby prevented from extending their flat to the back above the saloon proposed to be erected by the petitioner; that these buildings would thus encroach on the rights of the respondents as proprietors of said flat; that the petitioner is not entitled to build on the back area to a height which would infringe on the rights of the proprietors of the upper flats: Therefore, to this effect, sustains the defences for the city of Edinburgh: Refuses the application," &c.

No. 176.
July 19, 1881.
Boswell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

Boswell again appealed to the Court of Session.

After hearing counsel¹ the Second Division, before further answer, "remitted to Mr John Burnet, architect in Glasgow, to examine the premises in question; and, with reference to the points in controversy in this process, to report his opinion whether the operations proposed will injure the light and air of the building of the respondents above that of the appellant, or affect the value of the same, and to accompany his report with any remarks he may consider likely to be of assistance to the Court."

Mr Burnet reported that he was of opinion that "the building operations proposed would injure the light and air of the buildings of the respondents above that of the appellant, but to so inappreciable an extent as not to affect the value of the same."*

¹ Authorities referred to.—Stewart v. Blackwood, Feb. 3, 1829, 7 S. 362; Scott v. Commissioners of Police of Dundee, Dec. 18, 1841, 4 D. 292, 14 Scot. Jur. 121; Urquhart v. Melville, Dec. 22, 1853, 16 D. 307, 26 Scot. Jur. 137; Cochrane v. Ewart, Jan. 13, 1860, 22 D. 358, 32 Scot. Jur. 160, March 25, 1861, 23 D. (H. L.) 3, 4 Macq. 117, 33 Scot. Jur. 435; Gow's Trustees v. Mealls, May 28, 1875, ante, vol. ii., 729; Johnston v. White, May 18, 1877, ante, vol. iv., p. 721; Barclay v. McEwen, May 21, 1880, ante, vol. vii., 792; Heron v. Gray, Nov. 27, 1880, supra, p. 155.

* Mr Burnet accompanied his report with this note:—"1. The proposed back buildings would undoubtedly diminish the light and air of the respondents' property; but the degree of interference would be so slight, that, in my opinion, the market value of the property would not be lowered. That value depends in a great measure upon the situation being in the centre of the business portion of the city of Edinburgh. In the event of a sale after the erection of the back buildings, should these be authorised, intending purchasers would not, I think, look upon the property as depreciated by diminution of light and air, as I consider the property would be possessed of both these essentials in sufficient quantity for all practical purposes.

"2. Such a building stance in Glasgow—that is, a steading stretching from a street to a back lane—is usually held under a single not a several ownership. In practice the whole plot from back to front is built over to a uniform height, but for the preservation of light and air a well or court is usually formed about the middle of the property, and the walls around this well or court are mainly of glass. The open space proposed to be allowed in the present case is larger relatively than is left open in Glasgow, while the space for light and air usually allowed in Glasgow is, as a rule, found to be quite ample.

"3. While the above is my opinion, I venture to make the following suggestions, as invited by the Court, with the view to minimising interference with the amenity of the respondents' property, and lessening the chance of injury to it from fire or housebreaking, through the erection of the back buildings, viz.—(1) There should be no windows in the wall of the proposed back buildings, facing the back windows of the respondents' property. (2) That wall should be entirely faced with white enamelled bricks. (3) The roof of the saloon, with its skylights or cupolas, should be placed no higher than the level of the lowest floor of the respondents' property. (4) No skylight or cupola should be placed in the roof of the saloon nearer the back wall of the respondents' property than 6 feet. (5) The roof of the saloon should be constructed of concrete, for prevention of fire contagion, and laid with white coloured tiles for light and general amenity. (6) The ceiling of the ground-floor of the appellant's back building—that is, the portion facing the lane—might be made lower, say 4

No. 176.

July 19, 1881.
Boswell v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

THE COURT having considered Mr Burnet's report, and being of opinion that there was no limitation to the appellant's right in the area of back ground in question, and being satisfied that there would be no substantial interference with the light and air of the flats above by the operations proposed, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild of 17th February 1881 appealed against: Grant warrant to the appellant (petitioner) to erect saloons and workshops as craved, subject to the alterations on the plans suggested by the reporter, and remit to the reporter to see the alterations carried into effect, and to report: Find no expenses due to either party, and decern."

T. J. GORDON, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—PATERSON, CAMERON, & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 177.

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

JOHN DAVIDSON, Complainer.—Trayner—R. V. Campbell.
GEORGE DALZIEL AND ANOTHER (Hewetson's Trustees).—D.-F. Kinnear
—Gloag.

Sale of Heritage—Objections to Title—Right in Security—Personal or Real—Real Burden.—By his settlement T M disposed to his wife in liferent his heritable property, and gave her "the disposal, as she may direct, of the sum of £125 sterling, to be paid twelve months after her death, out of or from the house now occupied by K," being a part of his heritage. He then disposed this house and another adjoining it, after his own and his wife's death, to his brother G M, or to his heirs after him, and added, "but this allotment is subject to the payment by the said G M or his heirs, in twelve months after the death of my wife, of the sum of £300 sterling, to be disposed of as follows, viz.—£125 sterling as aforesaid to be willed or disposed of by my wife," and the rest in small legacies.

G M having died, another brother, A M, served heir to him, and made up a title proceeding on his service and T M's settlement. The widow was also infert for her liferent.

During the widow's life A M borrowed money on the fee of the property, and, becoming insolvent, the subjects were sold by the creditors under the powers in their bond. The articles of roup obliged the exposers to deliver a formal and valid disposition of the subjects under the burden of the widow's liferent, and under the burdens, conditions, provisions, &c., specified, contained, or referred to therein, or in the title-deeds thereof, and stipulated that "in respect the exposers are not aware of any incumbrances affecting the said subjects," except their own bond, which they were bound to clear off, "they, the exposers, shall not be bound to furnish any certificate of searches of incumbrances."

A list of titles was appended to the articles of roup, and included the settlement of T M.

The purchaser refused to pay the price until the subjects were cleared of the burden of £300 payable out of them in terms of T M's settlement.

Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the purchaser, having bargained to take the subjects with any burdens which the title-deeds laid upon them, and having had the opportunity of examining the title-deeds, including the settlement of T M, was bound to accept the title tendered.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) that the burden of £300 imposed by the settlement of T M was not a real burden, but a personal obligation merely on G M and his heirs.

or 5 feet, as this height can readily be spared from the very high ceiling proposed. The height of the building itself would thus be reduced to a considerable extent, without detriment to the appellant, and to the advantage of the respondents' property in substantially lessening the height of the building opposite their back windows."

THE late Thomas M'Math was proprietor of certain subjects in the No. 177.
village of Penpont, Dumfriesshire.

In 1844 Thomas M'Math, and his wife Mrs Helen Crawford or M'Math, executed a mutual disposition and settlement, whereby Thomas M'Math conveyed his whole estate to his wife in the event of her survivance. After the death of Thomas M'Math, his widow, in 1869, expedited a notarial instrument on the mutual disposition, and was infeft in the heritable subjects in Penpont, but this infeftment was reduced in 1873, so far as necessary to give effect to the provisions in right of which Alexander M'Math then was under another deed executed by Thomas M'Math in 1865, to be immediately mentioned, on the ground that the mutual disposition had been thereby revoked.

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

2d Division.
Ld. Curriehill
I.

In 1865 Thomas M'Math executed a mortis causa disposition and settlement, whereby, in the first place, he gave, granted, assigned, and disposed to his wife in the event of her survivance—" (3) A liferent of all the property possessed by me in the village of Penpont, Dumfriesshire; and (4) the disposal, as she may direct, of the sum of £125 sterling, to be paid twelve months after her death, out of or from the house now occupied by James Hunter Kellock, merchant, Penpont, Dumfriesshire." And, in the second place, he bequeathed or gave, granted, assigned, and disposed, after the death of his wife as aforesaid, " to George M'Math, my brother, or to his heirs after him, the house and shop now occupied by the said James Hunter Kellock in Penpont, Dumfriesshire, together with the house next to it, now occupied by John Lorimer, . . . but this allotment is subject to the payment by the said George M'Math or his heirs, in twelve months after the death of my wife, of the sum of £300 sterling, to be disposed of as follows, viz., £125 sterling as aforesaid, to be willed or disposed of by my wife; £60 sterling to my brother Alexander M'Math, or to his heirs after him" (and other small legacies, making up in all £300).

George M'Math, mentioned in this settlement, died shortly after his brother Thomas, and Alexander M'Math, another brother, the pursuer of the above-mentioned reduction, thereupon served himself heir to George M'Math, and made up a title to the subjects in Penpont by notarial instrument proceeding on the service and Thomas M'Math's settlement. Alexander M'Math afterwards granted bonds and dispositions in security over the subjects in favour of Thomas Hewetson.

In 1879, Alexander M'Math having become insolvent, the trustees of Thomas Hewetson brought the subjects in Penpont to sale under the powers contained in their bonds, and they were purchased by John Davidson.

The articles of roup contained the following clauses :—" Sexto. Upon payment of the price, the exposers oblige themselves to grant and deliver a formal and valid disposition of the said subjects and others to the purchaser and his heirs or assignees, under the burden of the liferent of the said Mrs Helen Crawford or M'Math, and under the burdens, conditions, provisions, restrictions, reservations, and declarations specified and contained or referred to herein, or in the title-deeds thereof, but excepting from such warrandice, tacks, and rights of possession of the tenants of said subjects and others, and said liferent, and containing a clause of entry as on the death of the said Mrs Helen Crawford or M'Math, and shall contain a clause binding the granter of the said bonds and dispositions in security, and his heirs in absolute warrandice of such disposition, and . . . shall also contain a clause of warrandice on the part of the exposers from fact and deed only, and likewise all other necessary clauses. . . . And in respect the exposers are not aware of any incumbrances affecting the said subjects and others, except the foresaid bonds and dispositions in security,

No. 177. and which incumbrances the exposers bind and oblige themselves to purge, they, the exposers, shall not be bound to furnish any certificate of searches of incumbrances. . . . Undecimo.—Questions between the exposers and any purchasers or offerer concerning the import of these articles, or the implement thereof, are hereby submitted to the amicable decision of Thomas Brisbane Anderson, Esquire, solicitor, Dumfries; whom failing, of an arbiter to be named by the Sheriff of the county of Dumfries, on an application to him for that purpose by any party interested, and that as sole arbiter. . . .”

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

A list of title-deeds, including the settlement of Thomas M'Math, was appended to the articles of roup, and the titles themselves were borrowed by Davidson's agent prior to the sale.

Davidson refused to implement the purchase until the record was purged of Mrs M'Math's infetment so far as not reduced, and of the burden of £300 imposed on the subjects by the settlement of Thomas M'Math.

The exposers, Hewetson's trustees, had recourse to the arbiter, but the purchaser objected to his assuming the reference, on the ground that the point in dispute was not within the reference. The arbiter, in absence of the purchaser, decided the question in favour of the exposers, who thereupon expedite a charge against the purchaser under the extract registered articles of roup and relative decret-arbitral.

Davidson suspended.

He pleaded;—1. The complainer being entitled to a conveyance of the subjects sold, and the title thereto being ex facie of the record in Mrs M'Math, the arbiter had no power to order the complainer to take a title a non domino, and his decree is invalid. 2. The respondents being bound to clear the subjects and purge the record before insisting on payment of the price, and the record shewing incumbrances which the chargers refuse to have removed or discharged, the prayer of this note should be granted.

The respondents, Hewetson's trustees, pleaded;—1. The action is excluded by the clause of reference in the articles of roup, and by the decret-arbitral following thereon. 3. In any view the question whether the complainer is bound to implement his purchase falls to be determined by the arbiter under the said clause of reference. 4. In respect the purchaser bound himself by the foresaid articles of roup to be satisfied with the titles of the exposers, and not to object thereto, he is not entitled now to refuse to implement the purchase. 5. In respect the title of the sellers is not subject to any valid objection, the suspension falls to be dismissed.

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d June 1881, pronounced this interlocutor:—“ Finds (1) that by the 11th head of the articles of roup there are referred to the decision of the arbiter therein named all questions between the respondents and complainer as to the import of the articles of roup and the implement thereof, and that the present question relates to the import and implement of said articles, and that this suspension is barred by said arbitration clause: Finds (2), and separately, that by the 6th head of said articles of roup the subjects were exposed by the respondents and purchased by the complainer under the burden of the liferent of Mrs M'Math, and under the 'burdens, conditions, provisions, restrictions, reservations, and declarations specified and contained or referred to herein, or in the title-deeds thereof'; that, on the assumption that the burden referred to in the note of suspension is a real burden on the subjects exposed, the said burden appears in the title-deeds exhibited with the articles of roup; that the complainer must be held to have purchased the subjects subject to said burden; and that on this ground also the present suspension is barred: Therefore repels the reasons of suspension: Finds the charge orderly proceeded, and decerns: Finds the complainer liable in expenses," &c.

The defender reclaimed.¹

It was intimated at the bar that the respondents would not press their pleas founded on the clause of arbitration.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a suspension of a charge under extract registered articles of roup of a small property in the village of Penpont, Dumfriesshire, and relative decreet-arbitral. Several pleas have been stated, and some of them not without importance. The suspension is opposed, on the ground that the articles of roup contained an arbitration clause, and that the question raised by the complainer, namely, whether the will of Thomas M'Math laid the subject of sale under a real burden, fell within the reference. The respondents have gone before the arbiter and obtained a decision, ex parte it is true, in their favour, to the effect that there was no real burden created by Thomas M'Math's will, and on that decision they took their stand. The Lord Ordinary sustained that defence as the first ground of his judgment. But, in the course of the argument, the contention was abandoned, and the parties have desired our judgment on the merits of the question between them, just as if there had been no reference.

The second and alternative ground on which the Lord Ordinary proceeds is that by the 6th head of the articles of roup the subjects were purchased under the "burdens, conditions, provisions, restrictions, reservations, and declarations specified and contained or referred to herein, or in the title-deeds thereof," and that, therefore, Thomas M'Math's will being among the title-deeds exhibited, the complainer must be held to have purchased under the burden created by Thomas M'Math's will, provided it be a real burden, and was not entitled to withhold the price till the title was cleared.

As the question on the submission is withdrawn, the only matter which remains is whether there was a real burden created by Thomas M'Math's will of which the seller was bound to clear the title. The state of circumstances in which the question arises is complicated. By his settlement Thomas M'Math gave his widow a liferent of his heritable property in Penpont, and the disposal of £125 to be paid out of the house at Penpont occupied by James Hunter Kellock, and then, secondly, he gave the fee of his property at Penpont to his brother George M'Math, subject to the payment, within twelve months from the death of his wife, of the sum of £300, consisting of the £125 which was to be at the disposal of his wife, and of a number of small legacies.

That burden of £300 was made real, so far as it could be, by the notarial instrument of 1877 following upon Thomas M'Math's settlement, and in favour of Alexander M'Math, the heir of George M'Math.

The sellers, who are creditors of this Alexander M'Math, under bonds and

No. 177.

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

¹ Allan v. Cameron's Creditors, 1780, M. 10,265; Martin v. Paterson, 1808, M. App. Personal and Real, No. 5; Macdonald, &c. v. Place, Feb. 24, 1821, Hume, 544; M'Intyre v. Masterton, Feb. 3, 1824, F. C.; Ralston v. Farquharson, June 17, 1830, 8 S. 927; Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, Aug. 3, 1840, 1 Rob. App. 296; Magistrates of Arbroath v. Dickson, March 19, 1872, 10 Macph. 630, 44 Scot. Jur., 347; Stewart's Trustees v. Hart, Dec. 2, 1875, ante, vol. iii. p. 192; Morton v. Smith, Nov. 8, 1877, ante, vol. v. p. 83; Ball's Prin., sec. 919; Menzies' Lectures, 3d ed., pp. 843 and 883.

No. 177.

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

dispositions in security, exposed the property, subject to Mrs M'Math's liferent, under articles of roup, in which they state that as they are "not aware of any incumbrances affecting the said subjects and others, except the foresaid bonds and dispositions in security, and which incumbrances the exposers bind and oblige themselves to purge, they, the exposers, shall not be bound to furnish any certificate of searches of incumbrances." And they now say that the clause just read, coupled with the express stipulation that the subjects were exposed under all the burdens, conditions, &c., specified and contained or referred to in the title-deeds, put the purchaser on his inquiry, and bound him to ascertain for himself what burdens affected the subjects, and relieves them of any obligation to purge the record of any such burden which may exist.

Now, there is no doubt that a man may expose his property for sale under any condition he pleases, provided that condition is legal and clearly expressed, and if a purchaser purchases on the footing on which the exposure is made, he is bound, and cannot complain. If a property was exposed on the express condition that the purchaser shall take his chance of the title, I am not prepared to say that that would not be a legal stipulation. But then it must be clearly expressed. Here there is great obscurity. No doubt the bonds and dispositions in security under which the property was exposed were the only burdens of that class which affected the property. But it is clear, first, that the exposers were aware of the settlement of Thomas M'Math, and of the construction which had been or might be put on it; and, second, that the purchaser was also aware of the existence and terms of that will, though his attention was not expressly called to the argument which might be founded on it.

I might have had great difficulty on the point whether the exposers, being thus aware of the supposed burden, were entitled to state that they were not aware of any encumbrances affecting the subjects other than their own bonds, and were not bound to call the purchaser's attention to this supposed burden. I should have preferred to have found that they did call the attention of the purchaser to it. But I feel myself relieved from the necessity of determining that point, because I am clear that there was no real burden created by Thomas M'Math's settlement. That settlement was a bequest of the fee of this heritable subject to a certain person, with an obligation on him, which never was more than personal, to pay certain legacies, including this sum of £125, of which the testator's widow had the power of appointment. It is impossible to maintain that all these legacies are constituted real burdens, and though the power of appointment is given in somewhat different terms, I am not able to distinguish between it and the legacies in this matter. I am entirely of the opinion expressed by the Lord President in the case of the Magistrates of Arbroath (10 Macph. 635). It may be that the precise words "real burden" need not be used if equivalent words are used, but that there must be equivalent words appears to me to be indispensable if the burden is to be one to which singular successors are to be liable. Apart from the point that this is a contingent burden only, conditional upon the exercise of a power by the testator's widow, which she may never exercise, which in itself creates some difficulty, I am of opinion that there is no constitution of a real burden by the settlement of Thomas M'Math. The words used are wholly insufficient for that purpose. The case of the Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts (1 Rob. App. 296) does not in the least conflict with this view. It related to a perfectly different matter, to conditions or restrictions affecting the land itself, and not to payments out of the land. But, notwithstanding that important decision, the law remains that to constitute a money payment a real burden on land words must be used to express that it is real, and as there are none such here I am of opinion that there is no ground for this suspension.

No. 177.

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

LORD YOUNG.—The case has been presented to the Court rather clumsily. The charge was one on articles of roup and a relative decreet-arbitral, and it was sought to be suspended on the ground that the arbiter had no jurisdiction, because the point in dispute was not the subject-matter of the reference. The Lord Ordinary thought that the arbiter had jurisdiction, but he also thought the arbiter's decision was right. We have had both points argued to us, but after the argument had gone a certain way the respondents said they would abandon the arbiter's decision, and both parties agreed to take our judgment on the merits, as if there had been no reference, and the argument was concluded accordingly. As I understand the present position of matters, if we are satisfied that on the merits the arbiter's decision was right, then we must find the charge orderly proceeded.

Now, I am of opinion that the arbiter did decide rightly—not that there was no real burden here, because neither he nor I can determine that in the absence of Mrs M'Math and others interested—but that the suspender took the risk of such burdens as there might be as a condition of his bargain. In this process, to which Mrs M'Math is not a party, we cannot decide what are Mrs M'Math's rights under her husband's will. We must take the case on the same footing as the arbiter did, that there may be a real burden, and I am of opinion that the suspender bought with express notice of Thomas M'Math's will and its whole contents, and that with whatever burdens it saddled the property he deliberately took it. With notice of this will he bargained to take the subjects with any burdens which the title-deeds laid upon them. He now says he had no notice of the notarial instrument whereby this burden, if it be a burden, is put on record. But he had the deed itself as well as the notarial instrument sent to his agents, and he had the same means of ascertaining as the exposers what burdens affected the subjects and entered the record. Nothing was concealed from him,—for it is not suggested that the exposers knew that this burden was a real burden and did not draw his attention to it,—and he in express terms took his chance of what burdens there might be.

Without attempting to decide whether and to what extent, if any, this deed burdens the property, it is sufficient for our decision that the suspender bought with notice, and that it was an express condition of the bargain that there should be no relief.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the reasoning of Lord Young. I cannot say that, knowing what we now know, the articles of roup were framed in the most judicious way. But I can understand the difficulty under which the exposers laboured. There are two ways in which this particular burden of £125 might be dealt with. It might be treated as a burden on the owner, or on the property, and it was not very clear which was its true nature. But it was plain that it was a prospective and contingent burden only. It was certainly at the date of the sale not an actual present incumbrance on the property. Mrs M'Math might exercise the power conferred on her, or she might not. But in the meantime she had not exercised it, and, therefore, there was no sum with

No. 177. which the property was burdened, and no creditor. I think, therefore, it was the dubiety arising from these circumstances which led the exposers to frame the obligation to purge incumbrances at the end of the 6th clause of the articles of roup in the terms in which it is expressed. And having so expressed it, they are not, in my opinion, bound to relieve the purchaser of all dubiety as to this £125, which might or might not come to be an incumbrance.

July 19, 1881.
Davidson v.
Dalziel, &c.

But supposing they knew, as I think they did, that there had been a notarial instrument recorded, whereby this power of appointment, to the extent of £125, had entered the record, I am of opinion that, on the true interpretation of the 6th clause of the articles of roup, the risk was taken by the purchaser. So far as a burden at all, it was clearly one "contained or referred to" "in the title-deeds thereof,"—that is, of the property—and such burdens the purchaser undertook. A list of title-deeds was appended to the articles of roup, and the first on the list was the settlement of Thomas M'Math. It is hardly contended that the means of knowledge were not as much in the hands of the purchaser as of the exposers. In point of fact, the titles were examined by his agent previous to the sale. The time for raising this question was before he went forward to bid, and not after he had made the purchase. And if, on examination, he was not satisfied, he should have held back.

I therefore agree in the opinion of Lord Young, and in the second ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

I may add, that if the issue had been properly presented to us for decision, whether or not this £125 had been made a real burden on the property, I should have adopted the view which has been expressed by the Lord Justice-Clerk.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it right to say, after hearing the expression of your Lordships' views, that I certainly did not intend to decide what the right of Mrs M'Math or her appointees might be. It is too clear to require to be pointed out that in a question between a seller and a purchaser nothing that is done or decided can affect the rights of an incumbrancer.

But where a purchaser undertakes to shew that there is an incumbrance which affects the subjects, not only are we put to decide that question, but it is, in my opinion, the only one which we can decide.

And, lastly, I had fully in view the rule that if the question is a doubtful one the seller is bound to give notice of it. But I was of opinion that the question was not doubtful. The mere fact, however, that the purchaser had access to the titles would probably be sufficient to prevent challenge on the ground that there was a burden undisclosed.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN LATTI, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 178.

WILLIAM GRAHAM and SPOUSE, Petitioners.—Keir.

July 19, 1881.
Graham.

2D DIVISION.
M.

Judicial factor—Tutor-dative, appointment of, while ward's father still alive.—Colonel William Graham, proprietor of the entailed estate of Mossknow, in the county of Dumfries, and Mrs Ann Mair or Graham, his wife, presented a petition to the Second Division of the Court of Session for appointment of a tutor-dative to their eldest son, William Mair Graham. The petition set forth "that, on April 25th 1855, the said William Mair Graham, then twenty-three years of age, was found and cognosced under a brief issued from her Majesty's Chancery incompos mentis et fatuus, and that he had been in that state from the tenth year of his age. The said William Mair Graham has, since the said date, continued to be in the same state of mental incapacity. The petitioner, William Graham, has acted as tutor to his said son, who has resided in family with him at Mossknow since that date. The said petitioner, however, is now eighty-four years of age, is nearly blind, and very infirm, and is thus no longer able to act as tutor to his son. He is accordingly desirous to be relieved of his duties as tutor, and to have some one who is able and fitted to take charge of his son and his estate appointed tutor-dative to him. The said William Mair Graham is next heir of entail to the petitioner in the said estate of Mossknow, and has also an interest in part of his mother's adjoining property." No. 178.

July 19, 1881.
Graham.

No answers having been lodged to the petition, the Court granted the petition, and appointed James A. Crawford, Esq., late of the Bengal Civil Service, to be tutor-dative.

FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES HENDERSON FERGUSON (Trustee on John Clark Yuill's Sequestrated Estate), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Balfour—Jameson. No. 179.

CENTRAL HALLS COMPANY (LIMITED), Respondents.—Pearson—W. C. Smith.

July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

Public Company—Liability for calls where shares forfeited for non-payment—Want of Notice.—The articles of association of a limited company provided that "twenty-one days' notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call," and "a call shall be deemed to have been made at the time when the resolution of the directors authorising such a call shall have been passed." It also provided (rule 29) that "any shareholder whose shares have been forfeited shall notwithstanding be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of the forfeiture . . ." A call was made upon the 14th June, payable in equal instalments upon the 21st July and 23d August following. On the 28th June, before the date when notice of the call required to be given to the shareholders, the shares of a member of the company were forfeited in respect of non-payment of former calls. He received no notice of the call of 14th June until 13th August, when a circular intimating it was sent to him. Held that he was liable for this call notwithstanding the want of the statutory notice, the Lord President, Lord Deas, and Lord Mure holding that having ceased to be a shareholder before the time for giving notice had expired he was not entitled to that notice, but that his liability to pay the call arose under rule 29 without notice,—Lord Shand holding that the forfeiture of the shares did not affect the owner's right to notice, but that the liability for the call attached to all the shareholders from the date of the resolution to make it.

Mr J. C. YUILL held shares in the Central Halls Company (Limited). Upon his estates being sequestrated two claims were lodged by the company with his trustee for £169, 7s. 9d. and £723, 6s. 6d., being the amount of unpaid calls upon holdings of 10 and 200 shares respectively, and penal interest for non-payment. The trustee rejected the claims. 1ST DIVISION
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

The call in respect of which these claims were lodged had been one of £2, 10s. per share, made upon 14th June 1880. It was "payable at the registered office, in two equal instalments of 25s. each, the first instalment on Wednesday, 21st July, and the second on Monday, 23d August following." On 28th June the bankrupt's shares were declared to be forfeited, in respect of the non-payment of previous calls, and his name was removed

No. 179. from the register. No notice was sent to him of the call, and he received no intimation until a demand was made for payment, on the 13th August 1881. The articles of association of the Central Halls Company, so far as in point, are quoted below.*

July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

The company appealed to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire against the trustee's deliverance.

The trustee stated ;—" 6. With reference to the call of £2, 10s. per share, alleged to have been made on 14th June 1880, it is specially averred that said call was not duly made, and the amount thereof does not fall to be ranked on the bankrupt's estate, in respect, inter alia, by the articles of association of the appellants' company it is provided that calls can only be made subject to the directions contained in said articles ; and it is further provided, that twenty-one days' notice of the time of each call shall be made, whereas, in breach of said articles, no notice of the call was given to the bankrupt until after his shares had been forfeited, and after the time for payment of said call had come, or at least within twenty-one days of the said time. The call therefore fell."

He pleaded ;—" 2. The appellants not being creditors of the bankrupt for the sums claimed, in respect the calls alleged to have been made were not duly made, and the amounts thereof are not due, the trustee's deliverance should be sustained.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), upon 25th May 1881, pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds (1) that the main question at issue is,

* " VI.—CALLS.

" 12. The directors may, from time to time, but subject to the directions hereinafter mentioned, make such calls on the shareholders, in respect of all moneys unpaid on their shares, as the directors think fit ; and every shareholder shall be bound to pay the amount of every call to the persons, and at the time and place appointed by the directors. 13. Twenty-one days' notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call. . . . 15. A call shall be deemed to have been made at the time when the resolution of the directors authorising such a call shall have been passed. 16. If any call, payable in respect of any share, is not paid on or before the day appointed for payment thereof, the holder for the time being of such share shall be liable to pay interest for the same at the rate of ten per cent per annum from the day appointed for the payment thereof to the time of the actual payment. . . .

" VIII.—FORFEITURE OF SHARES.

" 25. If any shareholder fails to pay any call on the day appointed for payment thereof, the directors may, at any time thereafter, during such time as the call remains unpaid, serve a notice on him requiring him to pay such call, together with interest and any expenses which may have accrued by reason of such non-payment. . . . 27. If the requisitions of any such notice, as aforesaid, are not complied with, any share in respect of which such notice has been given may at any time thereafter, before payment of all calls, interest, and expenses due in respect thereof, be forfeited by a resolution of the directors to that effect. . . . 29. Any shareholder whose shares have been forfeited shall notwithstanding be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of the forfeiture, and the interest, if any, thereon. . . .

" XX.—EVIDENCE.

" 104. On the trial or hearing of any action or suit to be brought by the company against any shareholder to recover any debt due for any call, it shall be sufficient to prove that the name of the defender is on the register of the shareholders of the company as the holder of the number of shares in respect of which such debt accrued and that notice of such debt was duly given to the defender in pursuance of these presents. . . ."

whether the appellants, the Central Halls Company, are entitled to be ranked on their claim for a call of £2, 10s. per share on shares in their company held by the bankrupt, but forfeited as per resolution of 28th June 1880 : Finds (2) that it appears that this call was made by resolution on 14th June 1880, and that by article 15 a call shall be deemed to have been made at the time when the resolution of the directors authorising such a call shall have been passed : Finds (3) that while under the resolution in question the call was to be paid in certain instalments, and article 13 provides that 'twenty-one days' notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call; the bankrupt's shares were, on 28th June, a date previous to that on which, by article 13, the twenty-one days' notice required to be sent, declared to be forfeited under article 27, in respect of the non-payment of previous calls, &c., and the bankrupt's name being struck off the register of shareholders, no notice was sent to him of the £2, 10s. call : Finds (4) that article 104 declares that, in suing 'any shareholder to recover any debt for any call, it shall be sufficient to prove that his name is on the register as the holder of the shares, and that notice of the debt was duly given to him : ' Finds (5) that in these circumstances it is contended by the respondent, the trustee, that the appellants have lost any right to insist on the call, in respect of their failure to send notice : Finds in law that this contention is ill-founded as regards the £2, 10s. call itself, and that the appellants are entitled to be ranked on the estate for the £2, 10s. call on the bankrupt's shares, but not for the penal interest thereon. Reserving to pronounce further."*

No. 179.
July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

The trustee appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The call was not well made, because, by the articles of association, the power to make it was "subject to the directions hereinafter mentioned." One of those was the giving of notice, and none had been given in this case. Forfeiture of shares was a matter strictissimi juris; though the debt might be due when the call was made, it was not enforceable, if there was a failure to give notice.

Argued for the Central Halls Company;—The call was due from the day on which it was made.¹ The company were relieved from the duty of giving notice by the fact of the forfeiture of the shares.² The claim was based upon the 29th article of the articles of association. Notice under the 13th article was not essential to make the call effectual. It

* "NOTE.—On consideration of the various clauses in the articles, and the authorities that have been referred to, the Sheriff-substitute has come to be of opinion that the giving of the notice mentioned in the 13th article is not an absolute condition of liability on a call in the case of already forfeited shares. The clause is directory rather than imperative; and even if imperative as regards existing shareholders, the case of one who has ceased to be a shareholder is very different. For the object of the notice in question is manifestly to prevent a shareholder falling into a position as regards arrears that might entail forfeiture. But when he has already forfeited his shares, the only possible good of the notice to the former shareholder is to prevent his incurring the penal interest stipulated for non-payment. To that extent, therefore, and to that extent only, the Sheriff-substitute considers the effect of the want of notice to apply. The call itself became an existing debt on the 14th June, though it was not payable till the dates of payment. As long as Yuill remained a shareholder, he was entitled to the privilege of one; but not after, through his own default, he had ceased to be one."

¹ In re the China Steamship and Labuan Coal Co. (Limited), Dawes' case, 1869, 38 L. J. Chanc., 512.

² In re Blakeley Ordnance Co., Stocken's case, Jan. 16, 1868, 3 L. R. Chanc. App. 412; the Companies Act, 1862, first schedule, table A, 20.

No. 179. was directory, not imperative.¹ Want of notice did not even relieve the shareholders, and the bankrupt had ceased to be a shareholder.

July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

It was not contended that penal interest was due.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears that the bankrupt in this case was a shareholder in a company called the Central Halls Company (Limited) to the extent of ten shares as regards one affidavit made in his sequestration, and to the extent of 200 shares as regards the other affidavit. He allowed the calls on each set of shares to fall greatly in arrear, so that at his sequestration he was owing, in respect of the ten shares, an aggregate sum of £169, 7s. 9d., and, in respect of the 200 shares, an aggregate sum of £723, 6s. 6d. The company claim to rank in his sequestration for these sums, and it appears to me that the controversy is now limited to one call only on the shares in question, namely a call made on the 14th June 1880. The Sheriff-substitute has given effect to the claim of the company, and has found them entitled to rank for that call along with the other sums which they claim, and I think that the Sheriff-substitute has done rightly. But as the point is one both of novelty and importance it is necessary to see exactly how the facts stand.

In consequence of the calls having fallen so deeply into arrear, the shares of the bankrupt were forfeited on the 28th June 1880, i.e., the date of the resolution of the company declaring the shares to be forfeited. It is not contended that any informality or invalidity attaches to this forfeiture. It was carried out exactly in terms of the articles of association. The call was made on the 14th June, just a fortnight before the forfeiture of the shares; and the 29th article of association provides that “any shareholder whose shares have been forfeited shall, notwithstanding, be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of the forfeiture, and the interest, if any, thereon.” In virtue of this clause of the articles of association it is not doubtful that the company have a good action against shareholders whose shares have been forfeited, for any calls made and owing at the date of the forfeiture. It seems to me that where a resolution making a call has been passed, the call becomes a debt of the shareholder. But it is contended that to make the call effectual it is necessary that there should be intimation in terms of the 13th head of the articles of association. The 12th head provides—“The directors may from time to time, but subject to the directions hereinafter mentioned, make such calls on the shareholders in respect of all moneys unpaid on their shares as the directors think fit; and every shareholder shall be bound to pay the amount of every call to the persons and at the time and place appointed by the directors.” And the 13th head provides—“Twenty-one days’ notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call.” Now, the resolution of the directors not only imposed a call but appointed a time and place when and where the call was to be paid, and at the date of the forfeiture there had been no failure to give notice, because there was plenty of time after the 28th June, the date of the forfeiture, to give notice of the time and place of payment, the first instalment of the call being payable on the 21st July and the second on the 23d August. Consequently on the 28th June there had been no failure of duty on the part of the company or its directors to intimate the time and place of payment of the call. But on the 28th June the bankrupt ceased to be a shareholder through the forfeiture of his shares, and the question therefore is, whether the company were under an obligation to give him twenty-one days' notice in terms of the articles of association.

¹ Newry and Enniskillen Railway Co. v. Edmunds, Feb. 5, 1848, 2 Walsby, Hurlstone, and Gordon, 118.

It appears to me that the twenty-one days' notice is a privilege of the shareholders, and a very important privilege. For if they had not twenty-one days' notice of the time and place of the call they might incur the risk of forfeiture by failure to make payment at the time and place appointed, and they might also be found liable in payment of penal interest. It is therefore clearly a privilege to which they are entitled. What the precise effect of failure to give notice would be in the case of a shareholder whose name is still on the register I do not think it necessary here to determine. It is a point of some difficulty.

But the question here is, whether one who has ceased to be a shareholder is entitled to that privilege which belongs to existing shareholders? and I think, with the Sheriff-substitute, that at the date of the forfeiture there was a debt due, not only for calls then payable, but also for calls of which the terms of payment had not arrived. They were debts due by the bankrupt, but due by him not as a shareholder, but as having been a shareholder. At the same time, whether or not one who has been a shareholder is entitled after the forfeiture of his shares to notice in terms of the articles of association, he is certainly entitled to some notice. Every man is entitled to some notice as to when and where he is to pay his debts. And notice of this kind the bankrupt has had. On 13th August a circular was sent to him intimating that a call had been made, payable in equal instalments on the 21st July and the 23d August, and requiring payment. That is not notice in terms of the articles of association, but it is a perfectly sufficient intimation to any ordinary debtor, and having ceased to be a shareholder the bankrupt is just in the position of an ordinary debtor. Therefore I am of opinion that this is a debt due by the bankrupt, or, rather, a debt in his sequestration, which may be enforced in the ordinary way.

LORD MURE.—I think this is a delicate question; but, on the whole, I agree with your Lordship. It is not disputed that the call was here duly made, or that a time and place of payment were fixed in the resolution by which it was made. But it is maintained that, as no special notice of this had been given to the bankrupt, in terms of the 13th section of the articles of association, which provides "that twenty-one days' notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call," the company, in respect of this failure, have now no right to recover payment of the calls. The argument of the respondents, on the other hand, is that, after the forfeiture of the bankrupt's shares, which was duly made on 28th June, for failure to pay calls previously due, the provision as to giving notices to shareholders under section 13 of the articles of association no longer applied to the appellant. The Sheriff-substitute has, I think, rightly given effect to that view. What might have been the effect of want of notice, if the bankrupt had remained a shareholder, I do not think it necessary to inquire. He was not in the position of a shareholder entitled to notice, and the 29th section of the articles lays upon him the obligation to pay calls, notwithstanding forfeiture of his shares.

LORD SHAND.—I have come to the same result as your Lordships in holding

No. 179.

July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

No. 179. that the Sheriff-substitute is right in saying that as regards the £2, 10s. call itself "the appellants are entitled to be ranked on the estate for the £2, 10s. call on the bankrupt's shares, but not for the penal interest thereon." But while I agree with this result I do not put that result on the same grounds as your Lordships have done.

July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

On the 14th of June the directors resolved that there should be a call of £2, 10s. per share, "payable at the registered office in two equal instalments of 25s. each, the first instalment on Wednesday 21st July, and the second on Monday 23d August 1880." On 28th June the shares of the bankrupt were forfeited in respect, not of this call, but of former calls. At the date of the forfeiture two days only had to elapse before the twenty-one days required for the notice of the payment of the first instalment would begin to run. But no notice was given to the bankrupt, and no intimation of the call was made to him until after the first instalment had become payable, and ten days before the second fell due. Now, as I understand the view of your Lordships, this gentleman, being no longer a shareholder, was no longer entitled to notice in terms of the articles of association. I cannot assent to that view. I do not think that the circumstance that his shares had been forfeited puts Mr Yuill, as regards notice, in any different position from those who remained shareholders. I think that he was entitled to the same notice. The articles of association provide—"Twenty-one days' notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call." Now, if the liability of the shareholders for payment of the calls is conditional upon their getting notice, it appears to me to follow that the liability of Mr Yuill must be the same. For I cannot see that the forfeiture can take away the right to notice of calls which is the condition of the shareholder's liability. The case, therefore, seems to me to raise this question, with which I think the Court ought to deal, viz, whether the call creates a merely contingent liability dependent on due notice being given, or whether the liability is absolute although the time of payment is conditional on the shareholder having twenty-one days' notice?

Now, it is not disputed that the resolution making the call was quite in terms of the articles of association. A clear interval of twenty-one days intervened between the date of the resolution and the time fixed for the payment of the first call, and there was a month between the two successive terms of payment. Now, the effect of making a call seems to me to be to create an instant debt, and I think that this view is very much supported by the 15th article of association, which provides "that a call shall be deemed to have been made at the time when the resolution of the directors authorising such a call shall have been passed." In short, I do not think that anything of the nature of a merely conditional or contingent liability is created by the call. Take the case of a call in which notice had been given to some of the shareholders but not to others. The result of making the liability conditional on notice being given is that there would be a debt created as against the one body of shareholders who receive notice, but not as against the other who do not. This seems to me to be a very disastrous result in carrying on such a company. It is said that the directors might make a new call. But that, it appears to me, would be very anomalous. I never heard of such a thing. I think, therefore, that the call creates an instant liability, and that the only effect of not giving due notice is, that a notice must subsequently be given to pay the call twenty-one days afterwards. The only difference between such a case, and one in which notice has been duly given is, that penal interest does not run for twenty-one days after the date of the notice actually given. No. 179.

July 20, 1881.
Ferguson v.
Central Halls
Co. (Limited).

LORD DEAS.—For the reasons stated by your Lordship in the chair and Lord Mure, I concur; but supposing I were to hold these reasons not to be well-founded, I should then be prepared to concur in the separate ground stated by Lord Shand, in the concluding portion of his opinion, as of itself sufficient to lead to the same result.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES HALDANE, Judicial Factor on the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Company, Petitioner.—D.-F. Kinnear—Graham Murray. No. 180.
GIRVAN AND PORTPATRICK RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—Haldane v. Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Co.
Mackintosh—J. P. B. Robertson.

July 20, 1881.
Haldane v.
Girvan and Portpatrick
Railway Co.

Railway—Judicial Factor—Special Powers—Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 126, sec. 4.—A judicial factor appointed on the undertaking of a railway company under sec. 4 of the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867, presented a note to the Court for authority to enter into negotiations for the sale of the line, and upon consideration of the result of the negotiations, for authority to apply to Parliament for an Act authorising either the sale of the line or the raising of capital by the issue of debentures. Held that the judicial factor did not require special powers to enter upon the negotiations.

(Supra, p. 669.)

1st DIVISION.
B.

Mr Haldane who had been appointed judicial factor on the undertaking of the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Company under section 4 of the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867, presented this note, praying the Court "to authorise the judicial factor to enter into negotiations for the sale of the line, and to receive offers for the purchase thereof; and thereafter, upon consideration of the result of the said negotiations and the offers received by the judicial factor, as reported by him to your Lordships, to authorise him to apply to Parliament for an Act or Acts authorising the sale of the line, or otherwise for an Act or Acts authorising him to raise capital to an extent not exceeding £20,000 by the issue of debentures, which shall rank preferably, both as regards principal and interest, to the debentures already issued or authorised under the Girvan Company's existing Acts of Parliament." In the note the various negotiations of the factor for the working of the line were narrated, and it was stated that the only proposal of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company for working the line was for a six years' arrangement.

The directors of the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway lodged answers to the note, in which they stated that it was desirable, both for the company and the public, that the Glasgow and South-Western Company should continue to work the line. They subsequently stated at the bar that the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company were willing to enter into an interim arrangement to work the line for six months.

The judicial factor asked the Court to grant the first part of the prayer of the note authorising him to enter into negotiations for the sale of the line.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The note for the judicial factor in this case prays the Court "to authorise the judicial factor to enter into negotiations for the sale of the line, and to receive offers for the purchase thereof; and thereafter, upon consideration of the result of the said negotiations and the offers received by the judicial factor, as reported by him to your Lordships, to authorise him to

No. 180.

July 20, 1881.
Haldane v.
Girvan and Portpatrick
Railway Co.

apply to Parliament for an Act or Acts authorising the sale of the line, or otherwise for an Act or Acts authorising him to raise capital to an extent not exceeding £20,000 " for the purpose of working the line. Now, all that is proposed at present is that the first part of that prayer should be granted, viz., that the factor should have authority to enter into negotiations for the sale of the line, and to receive offers for its purchase. I confess I do not think it at all necessary that the factor should have any special authority to enter into such negotiations. I think they fall very naturally and properly within the scope of his powers as judicial factor. Of course, before any concluded arrangement can be made, he must report to the Court and obtain their sanction to apply for an Act, which would certainly be necessary in order to enable him ultimately to sell the line. And therefore, in so far as what is at present asked for by the factor is concerned, I am disposed not to grant it, as being unnecessary. But it is suggested, on the other side, by the directors of the line, who are superseded in the management, but still represent the corporation, that the proposal or suggestion of Mr Haldane that the line should not be any longer worked by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway after the 31st of this month, is a very inexpedient thing for the sake of the company and the public; and they say that the Glasgow and South-Western Company are willing to continue to work the line for another temporary period of six months or so while these negotiations are going on. I think it is much to be regretted that that proposal was not made to the factor, the only person who had any power to entertain or listen to it. But now that it is made, I have no doubt that the factor will give due consideration to it. The only communication that the Glasgow and South-Western Company have made to him as yet seems to me to be a proposal to renew for a period of six years the previously existing working agreement, or something very like it; and that proposal, I think, the factor was very well advised in declining. But that it may be expedient to enter into a reasonable arrangement for working this line for six months more, while these negotiation are going on is, I think, a very proper subject for the consideration of the judicial factor, and in his hands I think your Lordships should leave it.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT did not pronounce any order.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 181.

July 20, 1881.
Clapperton,
Paton, & Co.
v. Anderson.

CLAPPERTON, PATON, & COMPANY, Pursuers.—Ure.

ADAM ANDERSON, Respondent.—Campbell Smith—Rhind.

Caution—Stat. 1696, cap. 25—Stat. 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60 (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856), sec. 6—Name of creditor in obligation omitted.—A and B signed an obligation to become sureties for an instalment of a composition on C D's bankrupt estate. Held that the obligation was not void by reason of the creditors in the obligation not being named.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ON 18th December 1876 Adam Anderson granted, along with two others, a cautionary obligation in the following terms:—' We, hereby agree to become, jointly and severally, sureties for payment of the last of four instalments of a composition of fifteen shillings per pound, offered by James S. M'Laren on the debts due by his firm of Todd & M'Laren, drapers, Lanark, said instalments being payable at three, six, nine and twelve months from 15th December 1876; moneys to be lodged by him fortnightly for behoof of the creditors to meet the several instalments as they fall due; Mr John S. Todd, his partner, to retire from the firm without consideration, he receiving his discharge under the composition settlement; but the subscriber, Adam Anderson, hereby restricts his liability under this obligation to the sum of £135, and no more." The instalment was not paid, and on 8th September 1880 Clapperton, Paton, & Company, creditors of James S. M'Laren, raised an action against Anderson in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire for £49, 11s. 8d., being the proportion of the sum of £135, guaranteed by Anderson, to which they were entitled in respect of their claim against M'Laren's estate.

Anderson defended the action.

Pleaded for Clapperton, Paton, & Company;—(1) The defender having become cautioner, as aforesaid, for a debt due to the pursuers, which is still unpaid, decree as craved ought to be pronounced. (2) The defender being justly indebted and resting owing to the pursuers under said cautionary obligation the sum sued for, decree as craved ought to be pronounced.

Pleaded for Anderson;—(1) The creditors of the bankrupt M'Laren, including the pursuers, having, without the knowledge or consent of the defender, allowed the bankrupt to depart from the arrangement betwixt him and them under which the alleged cautionary obligation was created, the defender is freed from the said obligation. (2) The creditors of the said bankrupt, and particularly the pursuers, having failed to see that the condition in the alleged cautionary obligation in reference to the fortnightly lodgment of moneys by the bankrupt was fulfilled, and the same not having been fulfilled, the defender is freed from all liability under the said cautionary obligation. (5) The document founded on being defective and insufficient, the defender falls to be assoilzied.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 9th March 1881, repelled the defences, and decerned in terms of the petition.*

Anderson appealed to the Sheriff (Clark) who, on 13th May 1881, adhered.

Anderson then appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1)

* "NOTE.—The defender has not instructed any laches on the part of the pursuers or those acting for them, such as to liberate him from his guarantee. Every effort seems to have been used by Mr Tolmie to get the principal obligant to make the stipulated fortnightly deposits of money to meet the instalments of composition, and there is nothing to infer a discharge of the cautioner under the rules summarised in Bell's Princ. 263. The English cases of Watts v. Shuttleworth, 29 L. J., Ex. 229, 7 H. and N. 353, and Black v. Ottoman Bank, 8 Jur. N. S. 801, lay down rules which appear to be consistent with our own authorities,—viz., that the discharge of a cautioner does not take place by mere inactivity of the creditors unless there be such a degree of negligence as to imply connivance or fraud; but that there must be some positive act done by him to the prejudice of the surety, or an omission of an act which his duty enjoins him to do, and which omission proves injurious to the surety. There is nothing in evidence in this case of such a character, and indeed it may be reasonably held, as the pursuers argued, that the stipulation was one the fulfilment of which the cautioner himself was bound to see to. The defender's real reason for objecting to pay was, in truth, not the non-fulfilment of this alleged duty of the pursuers, but rather the non-fulfilment by the bankrupt of the other private arrangement, which has been held to be irrelevant as a defence. He was also quite aware, as the evidence shews, that M'Laren was not making the fortnightly payments.

"The guarantee is in favour of 'the creditors' of a party named, and I think it does not fall within the terms or the intention of the statute anent blank writs. There is a description of the grantees in which constat de personis, and that is all the law requires—Ersk. iii., 2-6."

No. 181.
July 20, 1881.
Clapperton,
Paton, & Co.
v. Anderson.

No. 181. The obligation was void, because the creditor was not named. Except in the case of a testamentary settlement, the creditor must be named and not merely described.¹ Such a document must be addressed to some one in order to be binding. The 6th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856 provided that all such obligations as this were to be in writing.² That surely contemplated that they should be addressed to some one. In that case the decisions in England under the corresponding section in the Statute of Frauds applied.³ (2) The creditors, by the way in which they had neglected to look after the debtor, and omitted to see that the fortnightly instalments were paid, had liberated his cautioner.

July 20, 1881.
Clapperton,
Paton, & Co.
v. Anderson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to see any ground for recalling the Sheriff's judgment. As to the constitution of the obligation, the appellant's counsel did not maintain that the English Statute of Frauds applied to Scotland, but he said that by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act such obligations must be in writing. This one is in writing. But then he says it is blank in name of the creditors under it. That is a mistake. It is not so. It is quite clear who is creditor under it. The case cited from English law is a totally different case. I think that under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act this is a good cautionary obligation, and that there can be no doubt as to who the persons are in whose favour it constitutes a right. On this matter I may refer parties to the note of the editor in M'Laren's edition of Bell's Commentaries, vol. i. 402, et seq.

As to the appellant's second point, I am unable to read the obligation as imposing on the creditors the duty which it is said was laid upon them. I am for adhering to the judgment of the Sheriffs.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—CAIRNS, M'INTOSH, & MORTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 182. RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN INGLIS, Pursuer.—D.-F. Kinnear—Sol.-Gen. Balfour—Trayner—Graham Murray.

July 20, 1881.*
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

SHOTTS IRON COMPANY, Defenders.—Asher—Mackintosh—J. P. B. Robertson.

Nuisance—Property—Calcining Ironstone.—A mining company leased the coal and ironstone on an estate, subject to the condition that they should not conduct any operations within a certain area (which extended about two miles from the mansion-house). They thereafter commenced calcining ironstone in bings at places beyond this area, near their march. The proprietor of the adjoining estate raised an action concluding for interdict against the company calcining within two miles of his lands, on the ground that the smoke from their bings was destroying the trees in his plantations. Held, after a proof, (1) that the pursuer had proved that his plantations had been injured by the defenders' operations; and (2) that he was entitled to interdict to prevent the defenders calcining within one mile of his march.

¹ Stat. 1696, cap. 25; Ersk. 3, 2, 6; Duncan's Trustees v. Shand, July 19, 1872, 10 Macph. 984, 44 Scot. Jur. 566.

² 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60, sec. 6.

³ Williams v. Lake, Nov. 18, 1859, 2 Ellis and Ellis, 349; 29 Car. ii. cap. 3.

* Decided July 5, 1881.

Dis. Lord Young, who was of opinion that further evidence should have been taken as to whether the places for the calcining bings had not been conveniently and reasonably chosen, having regard to the interests of the company as well as of the neighbouring proprietor.

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.

Inglis v.

Shotts Iron

Co.

2D DIVISION.

Lord Ruther-

furd Clark.

M.

THE SHOTTS IRON COMPANY became, by a series of leases between 1865 and 1873, lessees of the coal and ironstone and other minerals on the estates of Penicuik, Dryden, and Loganbank in the county of Midlothian. The minerals on these estates were of great value and large extent, and the leases were all of long duration. After the company had expended upwards of £50,000 in workmen's houses, water-works, railways, and other preparations, they, in March 1877, commenced calcining the ironstone raised from the estate of Penicuik at a point on that estate situated near to where it marched with the estates of Glencorse and Belwood, the properties immediately to the north-east of Penicuik estate. The bing erected at this spot continued to burn until the end of April, emitting during that period considerable quantities of smoke. The Right Honourable John Inglis, the proprietor of Glencorse and Belwood, through his agents, complained to the company that the result of the smoke from their calcining bing was to injure his plantations on these estates, and called upon them to desist. The company having, however, during the summer of 1877, constructed another bing on the same site, and also prepared other bings at no great distance, he, in October 1877, presented a note of suspension and interdict in the Court of Session against these bings being ignited. On 8th October interim interdict was granted. The Shotts Company lodged answers to the note, and on 27th November the note was passed and the interim interdict continued, and a record made up between the parties. A proof was in due course taken by the Lord Ordinary (Young), after which the Shotts Company, in March 1878, lodged a minute, in which they stated that "it was, and had always been, their intention to confine their calcining operations, in conformity with the usual custom, to the winter months, and that they hereby undertake to confine their calcining operations at the place mentioned in the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict to the months of November, December, and January in each year."

The proprietor of Glencorse thereafter lodged a minute, in which, in respect of the above minute of the company, he stated that he no longer pressed for interdict, but reserving all claims for damages, past and future, from calcining, and also reserving his right to apply for interdict against the company calcining during the months to which they now restricted themselves should the calcining become injurious to his property or a nuisance to himself.

On 12th March 1878 the Lord Ordinary (Young), "having considered the case, with the proof, and the minutes Nos. 44 and 51 of process, in respect of the undertaking of the respondents by their minute No. 44 of process, and that in consideration thereof the complainer does not now ask for interdict," recalled the interim interdict, found it unnecessary to pronounce any decree on the merits, and found the company liable in expenses.*

* "NOTE.—At the close of the proof I thought it proper, because it might be useful, to express the impression which I had, first, that the calcining which had taken place in March and April was contrary to custom and injurious to the complainer's property; and second, that the calcining in what were called the dead months of the year (November, December, and January) being the customary season for that operation, might be practised without injury (of the nature of a nuisance) to the complainer's property. Acting on the suggestion

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

The Shotts Company thereafter proceeded to calcine ironstone in November and December 1878, and January 1879, at the original place called Incline No. 1, at another place at some distance therefrom called Incline No. 2, and at a third place at a still greater distance called the New Hearths at Mauricewood. In November and December 1879, and January 1880, they calcined at Incline No. 1 and at the New Hearths, and from 3d January till 11th March 1880 they calcined at Incline No. 2.

The proprietor of Glencorse, finding, as he averred, that his plantations were being greatly injured by the continuation of the calcining, raised, on 30th October 1880, an action of declarator that the Shotts Company had illegally calcined ironstone to his nuisance, and for interdict against their calcining on any part of the Penicuik estate within two miles of the pursuer's lands.

In his condescendence he set forth the procedure in the note of suspension and interdict, and averred that the injury to the plantations had greatly increased, and that unless calcining was stopped the whole of his trees would be destroyed, and the amenity of his estate as a residential property be entirely sacrificed.

The Shotts Company lodged defences, in which they denied that the injury to the plantations complained of was caused by calcining. They also averred there were many mills and other factories in the neighbourhood of the pursuer's property. They also stated that their calcining operations were conducted in the ordinary manner, and if such operations were put a stop to the iron industry of the country would suffer serious injury, and its development would be practically arrested. They also offered to pay any damage which the pursuer could establish that he had suffered through them.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator implied in the expression of my impression, the parties have lodged the minutes Nos. 44 and 51 of process, which supersede the necessity of further controversy except on the question of expenses. On this question (having heard counsel) I am of opinion that the respondents must pay expenses. It was explained during the proof, and then for the first time, that the respondents recognised a custom against calcining in spring and summer, or except during the three dead months of the year (no doubt because of the probably injurious effects on vegetation in the vicinity), and that their calcining in March and April was exceptional and accidental. The present record gives no such explanation, and suggests no limitation of season for calcining. On the question of actual damage or not from the calcining in March and April the evidence is conflicting, but of the tendency of calcining at that season to damage vegetation, and especially trees, there is, on the evidence, no doubt, and to calcine then is admittedly contrary to custom. I must, therefore, hold that the complainer had reasonable cause of complaint, and his resort to the Court has been successful to the extent of putting a restraint upon the respondents, by their own voluntary undertaking given after the proof, and with which he is, I think, properly content, not to calcine except during the months of November, December, and January.

"I introduce no reservations into the judgment, because I think it unnecessary. The case before me involves no claim of damages, and no otherwise as regards the future, than that the respondents undertake to confine their calcining operations to the months of November, December, and January. The parties by their minutes have only enabled me, without further argument, to give effect to the opinion which I had formed (prima facie) on hearing the evidence, that the respondents ought to be restrained from calcining in the other months. The complainer is content with their undertaking. What may be the result of the respondents' use of the liberty which they retain, or what rights or remedies may thereupon arise to the complainer, cannot be now considered or be affected by what is now done."

and interdict as craved, in respect that the operations complained of are No. 182.
wrongful, illegal, and are to the nuisance of the pursuer.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The operations complained of being lawful, the defenders should be assoilzied. (4) The operations complained of July 20, 1881.
not being to the nuisance of the pursuer, the defenders should be assoilzied. Inglis v. Shotts Iron Co.
(5) The pursuer does not suffer, and has not sustained, damage entitling him to any of the decrees concluded for. (6) Separatim, no ground is alleged or exists for the delineation of two miles libelled, and the prohibition thus concluded for is uncalled for and unnecessary.

A proof was allowed, and evidence led at great length. The result of the evidence, which was in many instances very conflicting, may be shortly summed up as follows:—

Under the leases of minerals on the Penicuik estate the Shotts Company were taken bound not to carry on any of their operations within 150 yards of any feus granted on that estate or of any dwelling-house or farmstead, or on any land tinted brown on a plan signed as relative to the lease. The effect of these restrictions was that operations could not be carried on except at a very considerable distance—about two miles—from Penicuik House and the policies and plantations round it. Under the lease of Loganbank minerals the tenants were bound not to sink pits, or carry on any surface operations on that estate at all.

The part of the estate of Penicuik where the ironstone was brought to the surface, and on which, in immediate proximity to the pit-heads, the calcining bings were placed, was a narrow strip, about 300 yards wide, running between Glencorse, Belwood, and Mr Cowan's estate of Beeslack, and the bing at Incline No. 1 was only a few yards from the march of Glencorse. The other bings—Incline No. 2 and the New Hearths—were situated at a greater distance from the march, but neither further than 1000 yards therefrom.

The pursuer examined a number of witnesses, foresters and others, who all spoke to the good and satisfactory state of the plantations on Glencorse and Belwood prior to 1876, when the calcining commenced, and to the great falling off in the strength and appearance of the trees and plantations since that date. The symptoms of the diseased trees were stated by these witnesses to be clearly traceable to the effect of the sulphurous fumes from the bings. Other witnesses were adduced by the pursuer, who spoke from experience of the effect of similar fumes in other parts of the country, and stated that what was complained of here was, according to their experience, the result of calcining.

The defenders, on the other hand, although unable to bring forward any contradictory evidence as to the state of the plantations before 1876, adduced a number of witnesses, who stated that the condition of the trees was exactly what was to be expected from the want of draining, overcrowding, and injudicious treatment of the plantations. It was also proved that the seasons after 1876 had been exceptionally wet and cold. These witnesses also denied that the symptoms were such as resulted from smoke from calcining bings. One fact greatly relied on by the witnesses for the defenders in support of their view was, that not only were trees at a greater distance suffering while those nearer the bings remained comparatively uninjured, but that in some instances the injury was on the side of a tree farthest from the bing.

The pursuer had caused "smoke plans" to be made shewing the course which the fumes from the bings had taken during the periods of calcining. From these it appeared that the prevailing wind was south-westerly, and that the fumes were carried from that direction into the plantations.

The ore calcined was proved to contain only 1 per cent of sulphur, and

No. 182. of that it was estimated only 25 per cent was given off during calcination. The proportion of sulphur was thus no greater than in ordinary coal.

July 20, 1881. Ingليس v. Shotts Iron Co.

The scientific witnesses for the pursuer—Professor Dewar and Dr Dittmar—made various experiments, with a view to supporting their contention, that the injury to the trees was the result of sulphurous fumes. One of these was by what was called the “rain test.” Glass bottles, carefully protected, were placed at various spots on Glencorse and Belwood, and the rain water collected in them was subjected to analysis. A sulphate was discovered in this water—not free sulphuric acid. Professor Dewar and Dr Dittmar, however, accounted for the sulphate, by saying that it was composed by the free sulphurous or sulphuric acid combining with the soda in the bottles, which were new. They had not, however, ascertained, whether what they discovered was sulphate of soda.

The scientific witnesses for the defenders maintained that the sulphate found was sulphate of ammonia, which was formed by the sulphuric acid as it was set free at the bing, combining with the ammonia also set free during calcination. Sulphate of ammonia, it was stated, would not be injurious to vegetation.

Dr Dittmar deponed to another experiment made by him, namely, subjecting a number of trees, similar to those in the Glencorse plantations, in a small greenhouse, to fumes containing sulphuric acid in the proportion of five volumes to a million volumes of air. These plants were so exposed for about a month, at the end of which time it was found that about one-fifth of them were damaged by the fumes, and, to all appearance, in the same way as the trees in the plantations.

The pursuer’s scientific witnesses made a further attempt to ascertain the presence of sulphurous or sulphuric acid in the smoke and air, by means of what was called the “iodine test,” the result of which was to shew that sulphurous or sulphuric acid was present in considerable quantity.

The defenders’ scientific witnesses endeavoured, by analysing the leaves of trees in the plantations, to ascertain whether sulphur was present in them, but failed to find any unusual quantity.

A considerable part of the defenders’ proof was directed to the point that in no case could the fumes be dangerous beyond 400 yards, whereas the places where great mischief was said to have been done here were as far as 1000 or 1100 yards from the bings. It was proved that there was a large number of paper mills, coal mines, and other manufactories in constant operation, in the valley of the Esk, and in the immediate neighbourhood of Glencorse, and that these had been in existence for many years.

On 18th March 1881 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the libel: Further, interdicts and prohibits the defenders, in all time coming, from calcining ironstone, or iron ore, or burning blaes, on any part of the said lands of Penicuik, within one mile of the pursuer’s said lands, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses.”*

* “NOTE.—This case has been conducted on both sides with great anxiety and ability.

“When the Lord Ordinary came to hear the parties on the evidence it was admitted that there was no question of law between them. The Lord Ordinary has only to decide a question of fact. It is this—viz., whether the pursuer’s estate has been injured by the calcining operations carried on by the defenders. The pursuer conceded that he must establish a substantial injury. The defenders admitted that if he did so he was in law entitled to the remedy which he sought.

“The evidence which has been led is very voluminous and very conflicting.

The Shotts Company reclaimed, and argued ;—The pursuer had failed No. 182. in the proof. It was clearly proved by the evidence for the defenders

July 20, 1881.

The Lord Ordinary does not propose to examine it in detail. He will only refer to the more salient points, and state the considerations on which his decision is based. Inglist v. Shotts Iron Co.

"The defenders began to calcine in March 1877, and they have since continued to do so. They have three places—viz., No. 1 Incline, No. 2 Incline, and the New Hearths. At the first and third of these places the burning has been limited to the winter months, with the exception of the year 1877, when it began at No. 1 Incline on 13th March, and finished on 28th April. At the second it continued into spring, during the years 1877, 1878, and 1880.

"Incline No. 1 is situated very near the march of the lands of Glencorse, being not so much as 200 yards to the south of them. Incline No. 2 is close to Belwood. The New Hearths are about 1000 yards to the south of Glencorse, though considerably nearer Belwood. They are to the south-east of that estate. The pursuer complains chiefly of injury to the lands of Glencorse, though he also alleges that Belwood has suffered.

"The case of the pursuer is, that prior to 1877 the trees on his estates were remarkably thriving; that the first appearance of injury to the plantations was in the summer of 1877, immediately after the calcining in the spring of that year; that the injury has increased, and is increasing very rapidly; and that it is wholly due to the calcining. A large number of witnesses of skill support this view, and say that the injury from calcining is of the most marked and obvious kind.

"As the Lord Ordinary understood them, the defenders did not dispute that the plantations went back in 1877, but attributed that fact to the cold and wet seasons of 1876 and 1877. With respect to the conifera, which were the most injured, they say that their condition was due to over-crowding, want of draining, bad soil, and climate, and planting under deciduous trees, especially beeches. But they allege that, while such decay as exists is due to these causes, the plantations have within the last two years improved on the whole. They bring a great body of witnesses in support of their averments. These witnesses depone that there is not the slightest trace of injury from calcining.

"In this state of the evidence it is necessary to examine the reasons why the calcination of ironstone may be injurious to vegetation.

"The raw ore which is calcined by the defenders contains about one per cent of combustible sulphur. This substance, when burnt in the open air, gives off sulphurous acid, which gradually becomes sulphuric acid by the absorption of another atom of oxygen. It is not disputed that sulphurous acid and sulphuric acid, if present in sufficient quantity, are injurious to vegetable life. The question is, whether these acids, or either of them, reach the pursuer's land in such quantities as to injure vegetation.

"That the smoke from the bings comes upon the pursuer's lands is not capable of dispute. This has been matter of careful observation. Plans based on these observations have been made by Mr Blyth, shewing the number of times the smoke has come from the bings, and the distance it has reached. A reference to them will shew that the pursuer's plantations have been very frequently subjected to the influence of the smoke, and particularly at those places where injury has been observed—viz., Sergeant's Croft Plantation, Pheasant Corner, and Temple Walk. It is proved, too, that the smoke, if the weather is calm, hangs about the places which it has reached, and takes a considerable time to dissipate.

"But does the smoke contain or carry with it the acids in destructive or injurious quantity? Experiments have been made to test this point; but a very important one has been so conducted as not to give, by itself at least, perfectly reliable results. The Lord Ordinary refers to what has been called the rain test. The rain-water was collected in monthly quantities at six different stations in order to determine whether there was an increase of sulphuric acid in the air when the bings were burning. It is obvious that this experiment could never

No. 182. that what these trees were dying of was not poisoning by sulphurous fumes, but of overcrowding, want of draining, exposure to wind, bad seasons, and such natural causes.

July 20, 1881.
Ingليس v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

shew the maximum increase, but it gave some very remarkable results, which are tabulated at p. 109 of the evidence. What may be called the normal amount never exceeded five parts of sulphuric acid in one million parts of water. But at all the stations there was at times a notable increase; and at some an increase by more than five times—as, for example, at Sergeant's Croft and Pheasant Corner.

"The observers, Professors Dewar and Dittmar, draw the inference that the increase was due to an increase of free sulphuric acid in the air. But the soundness of the inference is not free from doubt, and it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the doubt could have been obviated had the experiment been conducted with more exactitude. If the acid was free in the air, in which state it is alone injurious, it would enter the collecting vessels as a free acid, and the Lord Ordinary does not see why an acid reaction could not have been obtained, which would of course have been conclusive. But, unfortunately, the vessels which were used were new glass bottles, of an ordinary or inferior kind of glass, and the glass contained soda, which would be taken up by any free sulphuric acid which entered the bottle. The liquid was therefore a solution of a sulphate. But of what sulphate? Professor Dewar assumes rather than proves it to be a sulphate of soda 128 F. If it were, the soda could only come from the bottle, and the acid must have been free in the air; for the air would not furnish any material addition of soda. But whether it was sulphate of soda has not been conclusively determined.

"It is said that the increase of sulphate might be and was probably due to an addition of sulphate of ammonia. Professors Dittmar and Dewar did not think that this was possible, and hence they did not determine the base of the sulphate. But the scientific witnesses for the defenders say that it is likely that a large portion of the sulphurous or sulphuric acid would combine with ammonia during the process of calcining, and hence that the air would contain an addition of sulphate of ammonia which would not do any harm. They do not, however, pretend that no sulphurous acid is given off in a free condition. Dr Voelcker computes it to amount to a quarter per cent of the entire sulphur.

"Another experiment was, however, made to determine whether there was free acid, and no objection seems to be stated against it, either as regards its theory or the manner in which it was carried out. It is detailed in the evidence of Professor Dittmar at pp. 111 and 112, and it shews a marked increase of acid at various places, and, as the Lord Ordinary understands, of free acid; for the theory of the experiment was to introduce a re-agent, in order to combine with such sulphurous acid as might exist in the air, and thence to determine the amount of the acid. It may be observed, with respect to the experiment made on 17th December 1880, that the amount of free acid found at Sergeant's Croft was 2.8 volumes per million volumes of air; and the note of the 'smoke observer' for that day is 'smoke at No. 1 Incline, Sergeant's Croft Plantation, Pheasant Corner, and Loganbank Grounds.' The evidence leads the Lord Ordinary to believe that the acid was present in such quantity as to injure; indeed it is not said by any one that such a proportion of acid to air as is indicated in these experiments would not be injurious. The Lord Ordinary may further notice the collection of water from the forester's house, and from a birch tree in Sergeant's Croft, which go a long way to shew the dissemination of sulphuric acid in injurious quantity.

"One other test may be referred to of a practical kind. Mr Dupré, a witness for the defenders, says, that if 'discomfort was at once felt by an ordinary observer the fumes that caused that discomfort would be injurious to vegetation.'—See Proof, p. 280. The case has occurred, and has been spoken to by several witnesses. The Lord Ordinary may refer, in particular, to the evidence of J. H. Dickson, p. 96.

"These later experiments and observations seem to the Lord Ordinary to

The onus was on the pursuer to shew that there was sulphur poisoning present, and he had failed. The evils he complained of were to be found in great force at distances at which the fumes must be held to have been quite innocuous. But even had some damage been proved the pursuer was not on that account entitled to the interdict craved. This was not a case of a manufactory being suddenly commenced in a rural district. The whole district was, and had been for many years, a manufacturing and mining one. Nor was it a case of selecting a spot where least damage would be done to their landlord and most to their neighbours. Nor were they carrying on any works which were not indigenous to the district. What they were doing was merely using the mineral products of the estate in the only way in which they could be used. Proprietors were not to be allowed to stand upon their extreme rights when what they were finding fault with was an industry not uselessly thrust upon them, but necessary to develop the resources of an adjoining property.¹ It was not sufficient that the pursuer should establish that some injury had been done to him; he had to make out that suffi-

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Inglist v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

prove that sulphurous fumes reached the pursuer's lands in a quantity sufficient to injure. But they do more. They seem to remove any doubt which attaches to the rain test, and to shew that the notable increase of sulphates was due to the increase of free acid, and not to sulphate of ammonia. Hence, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, it is proved that the calcining operations of the defenders were capable of injuring the pursuer's lands, and he is therefore disposed to accept the evidence of those who say that they did injure them, rather than the evidence of those who say that they did not. The Lord Ordinary may say that he places much reliance on the evidence of Dr Angus Smith, whose experience and position shew him to be a very competent observer, and whose testimony is very decided in favour of the pursuer.

"The defenders have, no doubt, some strong points in their favour. They have given evidence to shew (1) that the calcination of ironstone, containing no more combustible sulphur than that which is calcined by the defenders, is not injurious to vegetation (see the evidence of Dr Sloan and Dr Lawrence); and (2) that when an ore containing much more sulphur is calcined, the injury does not extend beyond 300 or 400 yards at the most—(See the evidence of Professor Stöckhardt). But these are isolated instances, which have not been examined on their own merits, and though very important, cannot, it is thought, outweigh the evidence which the pursuer has brought in this case.

"But they further found on the fact that the trees and hedges nearest to the bings have not suffered. It is certainly natural to suppose that the nearest trees and hedges would suffer first, and it is singular that this is not so in the present case. But this may be explained on the ground that the fumes have been carried past them or over them. It is impossible to speculate with any certainty on the height to which the fumes would rise, or the places to which they would be carried with destructive effect, or on the causes which may explain why some trees may resist while others fail. The circumstance founded on by the defenders is no doubt much in their favour, but it cannot overcome what the Lord Ordinary holds to be the positive evidence of the presence of injurious fumes in the pursuer's estates, and the injury resulting therefrom.

"It remains to consider how far the prohibition by the Court against calcining is to extend. This must necessarily be fixed in a somewhat arbitrary manner. But if the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken of the evidence be correct he thinks that it would not be safe to put the limit at less than a mile."

¹ St Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, July 5, 1865, 11 Clark's, H. L. Cases, 642, and cases there cited; Salvin v. North Brancepeth Coal Co., July 14, 1874, L. R., 9 Chanc. App. 705; Dewar v. Fraser, Jan. 20, 1767, M. 12,803; Ralston v. Pettigrew, July 29, 1768, M. 12,808; Bell's Prin. (Guthrie), sec. 9, and cases there cited.

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
 Inglis v.
 Shotts Iron
 Co.

cient had been done to constitute a nuisance. This he had failed in. There had been no attempt even to distinguish between injury resulting from natural causes and injury resulting from smoke damage. Interdict should not be granted in this case, as the operation was a natural and reasonable one for the purpose of making use of the property, and of turning it to the best account.¹ Any injury suffered was merely trifling compared to the beneficial results enjoyed. The degree of purity of atmosphere to which any person was entitled was a question of place and circumstances, and in this case the neighbourhood was already a manufacturing one, and the air was already greatly polluted. The smoke from the bings was ordinary coal smoke, and the same results would have followed from the erection of dwelling-houses. At all events, if it was held that substantial injury was done by these operations the true and just solution of the question was to take the case as one of damages, and not as a case for interdict. The defenders were willing to pay any damage which could be ascertained to have been caused by them.

Argued for the pursuer;—An actionable nuisance had been clearly established on the evidence. The plantations had been perfectly healthy up to the date of the commencement of the calcining, and after that date they had become unhealthy and diseased in a manner which it was utterly impossible to attribute to natural causes. The smoke was proved to enter the woods and to lie there in huge heavy masses, and the trees became unhealthy and shewed all the well-known symptoms of poisoning by sulphur. The nuisance being thus established, it was no answer to say that the calcining was carried on in a proper and convenient spot, and was a reasonable use of the land.² Interdict was the proper legal remedy. The ordinary rule of law was sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, and that applied here. If the Shotts Company could not carry on their works without injuring their neighbours' trees then they must desist.³

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary has decided this case on the footing that it only raised an issue of fact. The proof was led before himself, and he has returned his verdict on it in favour of the pursuer. We have never held ourselves precluded from reviewing the conclusion arrived at by a Lord Ordinary in such circumstances, even although we were not prepared to hold it contrary to the evidence; but in considering such a verdict on an issue of fact we must, of course, attribute the greatest weight to the opinion of the Judge who took the evidence, and saw and heard the witnesses, and I should be slow to alter the result expressed in his verdict, unless I thought the overbalancing elements material.

In the present case we have a voluminous proof, and have listened to an oral argument of great ability, extending over several days. After studying the printed papers with care, and giving my best attention to the pleadings from the bar, I have formed the opinion, not, I own, without difficulty, but ultimately without hesitation, not only that the view of the Lord Ordinary is not opposed to the weight of the evidence, but that the result which he has reached expresses the verdict which on these materials I should have pronounced.

¹ D'Eresby's Trs. v. Strathearn Hydropathic Co., Oct. 21, 1873, ante, vol. i. p. 35; Comyn's Digest, vol. i. p. 420.

² Hole v. Barlow, May 5, 1858, 27 L. J., C. P. 207; Bamford v. Turnley, July 12, 1862, 31 L. J., Q. B. 286; Walter v. Selfe, April 16, 1851, 20 L. J. Chanc. 433.

³ Kerr v. Earl of Orkney, Dec. 17, 1857, 20 D. 298, 30 Scot. Jur. 158; Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, &c., Dec. 21, 1866, 5 Macph. 214, 39 Scot. Jur. 591; Robertson v. Stewart, Dec. 11, 1872, 11 Macph. 189, 45 Scot. Jur. 115; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co., June 14, 1876, ante, vol. iii. p. 839; Fraser's Trs. v. Cran, June 1, 1877, ante, vol. iv. p. 794; Fletcher v. Rylands, May 14, 1866, L. R., 1 Exch. 208, and July 17, 1868, L. R., 3 E. and I. App. 330; Rankine on Landownership, p. 313, cases there.

No. 182.
July 20, 1881.
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

In explaining the general impressions on which I found this conclusion or verdict in point of fact it is neither to be expected nor desired that I should analyse the evidence in detail, and this is the less necessary that, while most of the evidence is weighty, and much of it is apparently conflicting, the material points of concurrence and divergence are marked by broad features, which admit of being easily arranged and illustrated.

The foundation of the pursuer's demand is very simple. He is the proprietor of the estate of Glencorse, in the county of Midlothian, a property which is said to be nearly 1000 acres in extent, and to have a rental of over £1200 a year. He says that for a great many years he has paid great attention to the ornamental plantations on his property, which cover a considerable area, and contain many good specimens of the rarer pines. Until 1877, he represents these woods to have been uniformly healthy and flourishing; but in that year the defenders, the Shotts Iron Company, who hold mineral leases of the ironstone in adjacent lands, commenced the process of calcining the minerals in open bings and heaps, at three points in an outlying corner of the estate of Penicuik, and bounded mainly by the lands of the pursuer, and those of Mr Cowan of Beeslack. The result is said to have been that, in the summer and autumn of 1877, a marked change occurred in the state of the woods. While they had been previously healthy, and in good order, the trees, especially the conifers, began to go back, and to exhibit all the symptoms, which he alleges to be well marked and notorious, of poisoning from the fumes of sulphur disengaged in the process of calcining. The pursuer accordingly raised an action of interdict against the Shotts Company, to have the process prohibited at the places where it had been carried on. This action was terminated in March 1878 by a compromise, by the terms of which, while both parties reserved their respective rights, the Shotts Company undertook to carry on calcination only in the months of November, December, and January.

It is not said that the defenders have violated this agreement; but the damage, so far from having been abated, is said to have increased as calcination proceeded; and on these general allegations the present action for declarator and interdict has been presented.

In defence, the defenders deny entirely that any damage or injury whatever has been done to the pursuer's property by the calcination. They say that the amount of sulphur disengaged in the process is so slight as to be absolutely innocuous, and what there is, is in the form of a sulphate, for the most part, which is not injurious to vegetation. They allege, further, that the parts of the pursuer's plantations said to be most injured are so far from the calcining bings as to be beyond the influence of the fumes; and that trees said to have been injured in some, if not in many cases, are near to, or in the neighbourhood of trees upon which the smoke has had no effect; and they specially plead that the decaying state of the pursuer's woods is owing to a combination of natural causes, under which they were certain to be unhealthy, and to decay.

I do not of course mean to go in detail through the testimony by which these

No. 182.
July 20, 1881.
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

conflicting views are maintained; but I shall shortly indicate the impression which the evidence on each side has made on me.

First, as to the pursuer's evidence. He has proved, as I think, conclusively, that, up to the period when this process of calcining commenced, these woods were healthy and flourishing. This seems to be clearly proved by four witnesses—the pursuer; Milroy, his forester; a man of the name of Robertson, who took a superintendence of the woods; and by the person in charge of the woods on the adjoining property of Beeslack. Their evidence is quite distinct—quite consistent—and altogether uncontradicted by any one who knew the woods prior to 1877, when calcining was commenced. In truth, no witnesses who knew the woods before 1877 have been called on the part of the defenders. The same witnesses for the pursuer also testify to the immediate and marked change for the worse which took place a few months after the calcining commenced in 1877, and this has continued and increased ever since.

The pursuer has also established, by a large and consistent body of testimony, that the appearances which thus suddenly were presented by his plantations were the distinctive results of sulphur fumes. These indications are now familiar to all acquainted with the ironstone districts, either in Scotland or in England; they are fully described by the witnesses, and were at once recognised by them as being the characteristic signs of injury by the fumes of sulphur. The substance of the evidence of these witnesses is to the effect that, as matter of fact and experience, trees will not grow within the reach of the fumes which are the product of the open calcination of ironstone, or, at least, that these fumes are fatal to healthy arboreal life. The experience of the “black country” in England, of the effect of the process in the neighbourhood of Durham, and especially of similar bings or burning heaps in the vicinity of Dalry, in Ayrshire, is said to demonstrate that, within the range of their operation, hardly a healthy tree is to be found.

It is farther sufficiently established by the pursuer's evidence, that, in point of fact, sulphur is evolved in this process of calcination in a quantity sufficient to affect, and in many instances to destroy, vegetable life, if subjected closely and persistently to their effects. On the general aspect of this evidence, I am of opinion that, if taken by itself, it is conclusive of the main allegations on which the pursuer's action is based.

One element in this proof weighs very much with me. I mean the fact, which I must hold as proved, because there is no evidence to the contrary, that these woods presented a healthy and vigorous appearance before the calcination began, and commenced to shew symptoms of decay immediately thereafter. That fact, to my mind, disposes of a large amount of criticism, for, if the distinctive appearances of sulphur were absent until the calcination began, and developed themselves for the first time a few months afterwards, no amount of theoretical opinion will avail to avoid the conclusion, which common sense must suggest, that the sequence of events in this instance indicates cause and effect. The evidence led by the defenders must, therefore, be considered and estimated in the light of this significant and suggestive fact.

I shall proceed to consider the defenders' evidence in two or three of the more important details to which it relates. I commence with one view which has been very anxiously elaborated, and which occupies a large space in this volume of evidence,—I mean the allegation that the injury to the pursuer's woods is the result of the operation of natural causes. It is alleged by many witnesses of character and skill that these causes are numerous and varied. Bad soil to begin with—inclement exposure, imperfect drainage, want of sufficient thinning in some places, injudicious thinning in others, are said to have tended to the general decay throughout all the plantations. Some of the pines have been planted under deciduous trees, where it is known they cannot thrive. Others on the site of former woods, where the roots of the former occupants of the soil hinder the young growth. Hence a fungus has attacked the roots, and a fly has devastated the leaves. In short, no physical calamity to which growing timber, especially pine, is subject, is, according to these representations, absent in the plantations of the pursuer.

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

The picture thus drawn by the defenders' witnesses, which I have not over-coloured, removes from the points of controversy one of the most important. It proves conclusively the injury which the trees have sustained, whatever the cause of it. If the condition of these plantations be as the defenders represent, they must have been the subject of some injurious influence, from whatever quarter it came. So far the evidence tends to corroborate the case of the pursuer as regards the condition of his woods in and subsequent to 1877. But when we come to consider this catalogue of causes, as accounting for the physical appearance of the woods, I must own that the evidence has not impressed me favourably, and is far from carrying conviction. It proves too much, and, so far from solving the required problem, is inconsistent with its conditions.

I do not doubt that, in a greater or less degree, all these injurious influences are to be discovered within the Glencorse plantations; and, I suppose, the same thing might be said of any wood of young pines in any district of the uplands of Scotland. Overcrowding and exposure to wind, planting under deciduous trees, or on the site of former plantations, are familiar elements in such parts of the country. Probably there is not a stretch of planting on the sides of the Pentlands in which they are not to be found, in some degree, even under the best management. It might also be assumed, but that is by no means so certain, that the appearances they are capable of causing in individual specimens have some particulars in common with those created by sulphur fumes. But although these things were granted, the causes in question are totally incapable of producing the result of the origin of which we are in search. All these tendencies are of gradual operation, as indeed the witnesses say; and although I am myself well satisfied that the conclusion to which they advance is only reached by the device of substituting the general for the partial (and the large amount of skilled and independent testimony adduced by the pursuer leads to that conviction), it is clear, on their own shewing, that these causes could not have produced the phenomena in question. Supposing that any one of them, or that all combined, might, in process of time, have converted the flourishing woods described by the pursuer into decaying and backgoing timber, they never could have combined to produce this result within the same three months. That all these different and unconnected causes of decay, which had never exhibited their presence before, were simultaneously stimulated into activity in the summer of 1877, it is impossible to believe, if we believe the uncontradicted testimony of those who were familiar with these plantations up to the beginning of that year. For that sudden change, and those unwonted indications of decay, we have one cause, and one cause only, established in the proof. It is an agent of the existence of which there is no doubt, and it is one which only came into operation for the first time shortly before these appearances began to shew themselves. I remain,

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
 Inglis v.
 Shotts Iron
 Co.

therefore, entirely unconvinced by this long and elaborate mass of evidence, and what I think its untrustworthy features throw an unfavourable light on the rest of the speculative testimony adduced for the defenders.

If, as has been maintained, the effect of the hard winter of 1876-77 was the source of this damage, it is but reasonable to think its operation should have extended all over Scotland; but we have no evidence to that effect. The illustration drawn from one of the woods of Penicuik is to my mind too vaguely proved, and altogether insufficient to neutralise the views that I have now expressed. I do not give much weight to, and place but little confidence in, that testimony.

Secondly, It is maintained by the defenders, and much insisted on, that these woods do not exhibit the general aspect known to be caused by the operation of sulphur fumes on vegetable life; and, in particular, that they do not exhibit one peculiarity which is found in these cases, namely, that the injury does not diminish in proportion to the distance from the bing; that trees which are near escape, while those at a greater distance are said to be injured.

Now, while it is clearly proved by the witnesses for the pursuer that, in general, the amount of injury does diminish in proportion as the distance from the bing increases, it is also true that there are many individual positions in which the vegetation has escaped, which are nearer to the bings than some of the trees which have suffered. But this arises from the operation of well-established laws. These fumes do not travel along or over the earth in a broad horizontal line, but generally in a close and often a narrow column, of varying altitude, according to the density of the atmosphere. They follow the direction of the prevalent wind, but the places which they assail are determined by many causes which it is difficult to trace. One of the pursuer's witnesses, Anderson, says—"All persons who know about these fumes know that they swim along the atmosphere in a body, as a rule, and they carry death and destruction along with them. The trees on the outside suffer worst. But if that is persevered with, it eventually kills the whole breadth of the plantation on which it strikes; and that is what I call a vista." (54, 55). In the same way Slater says—" (Q.) Do you find, in your experience, that the fumes will pass through a plantation in a certain direction, and leave a distinct mark of the progress of the fumes? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Passing through it like an avenue? (A.) Yes." And one of the defenders' witnesses, Mr Stead, says, in relation to the timber near the bings in the county of Durham,—"Of course the surface of the ground in the district has something to do with the effect. If the bings are in a valley the trees on the hills round about are more affected than if they were on flat ground, and I should say at a greater distance." In this way it is certain that proximity is not and cannot be an invariable rule, but it is modified by the breadth and altitude of the column, the configuration of the ground, and the nature, condition, and health of the plant affected. Allowing for these modifications, I think the evidence does establish that at Glencorse, as elsewhere, the injury from the fumes is greater the nearer the plant affected is to their source.

The only question on the evidence which I have found attended with difficulty relates to the distance at which these fumes are injurious. The defenders have collected a considerable body of evidence in order to establish that the sulphur fumes evolved from these calcining bings cannot travel to the distance relied on by the pursuer, at least with the noxious effect ascribed to them. I have considered this question with considerable anxiety and care, because the evidence led for the pursuer on this point is defective in precision, and that on the part of the defenders has at least apparently the merit of being pointed and specific. No. 182.

It is said by the defenders that the proper range of sulphur fumes emitted by calcination from open heaps does not extend beyond from 200 to 300 yards, at least as far as relates to their injurious effects. Now, the point at which the greatest amount of damage is said to have been done in the Glencorse woods by these fumes, namely, the point named in the proof Pheasant Corner, is at least 500 yards from bing No. 1, and over 1200 yards from bing No. 2; while the plantation at Flotterstone is considerably more distant. From this the defenders conclude that the trees cannot have been injured at these points from the sulphur fumes. July 20, 1881.
Inglist v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

I observe, however, in the first place, that the defenders' evidence on this head is not quite so conclusive as at first sight appears. It is true that Dr Voelcker asserts that none of the Glencorse trees were injured by the fumes. Dr Aitken says that the effects of the fumes seem to disappear at 200 yards, and several others of the defenders' witnesses concur with him. Dr Odling found no trace of them at 400 yards. But, on the other hand, Mr Vicars Thomson says the maximum distance at which the effects are even visible is from 400 to 500 yards; and Mr Ford says that "the fumes may have a slight effect probably to the distance of half a mile, or about that; but it is so slight that it is scarcely distinguishable."

Thus, as it stands, this testimony falls far short of demonstrating even the improbability of these fumes operating injuriously at 1000 or 1200 yards; and in regard to the analogies drawn from specific localities, such as Durham or Dalry, something may depend on the difference between level ground and the breezy uplands at the foot of the Pentlands. But the opposing evidence seems to me sufficient to displace any such conclusion. In the first place, such reasoning must yield to the fact, if it be a fact, that the trees at the distance in question shewed what I must hold to be clear signs of the effect of the fumes, for these were observed at Flotterstone, which is considerably beyond the range in question. In the second place, the description given by the pursuer's witnesses of the results observed by them in calcining districts seems to exclude the opinion that the effects of the fumes are limited to such distances. Further, it seems well established that the columns of smoke were seen all over the estate of Glencorse, and that the odour of sulphur which they bore along with them was sensible to quite as great a distance as the pursuer has alleged; and Dr Odling and Mr Dupré tell us that where the odour is perceived the presence of sulphur to an injurious extent may be inferred. And lastly, we have the results of the chemical experiments, with which the Lord Ordinary in his note has dealt in a manner quite satisfactory to me. With these I do not propose to deal in detail, but content myself with making one or two remarks on Dr Dittmar's and Dr Dewar's experiments with rain-water, which, although one flaw in the process prevents them from amounting to demonstration, are yet important contributions to the solution of this question.

These experiments were conducted at all the principal points at which injury from the fumes was alleged, and they certainly prove the presence of sulphur at all of them in an appreciable quantity. It is no doubt true that the sulphuric acid in the bottles was not free, but in the form of a sulphate; and it is said that this might have been sulphate of ammonia formed in the atmosphere by sulphurous acid in combination with the ammonia disengaged in the process of calcining, and that, if such were the case, the sulphur reached the stations in a state innocuous to

No. 182. vegetation. Now, if the sulphuric acid reached these experimental phials free, the result would have set the question of distance at rest. Unfortunately, the chemists did not test the sulphate for ammonia; the theory had not occurred to them, and therefore they have left this point doubtful; but they suggest that the sulphuric acid combined, after reaching the phials, with soda disengaged from the new glass of the bottles, and was therefore free when it reached them. Either theory, therefore, is possibly true, on the chemical evidence, and neither is proved. There is no evidence whatever to shew the amount of ammonia disengaged, or left unconsumed, in the progress of calcining, or to prove that any of it combines with the sulphur. Dr Vœlcker professes entire ignorance on the subject; and, although Dr Odling says it has been determined, he does not tell us when, where, or by whom.

But it does not follow that the experiment is to be thrown aside, for it proves that, combined or uncombined, the sulphuric fumes reached the different stations at which these experiments were made; and failing direct evidence as to whether they reached them in a deleterious or an innocuous state, correct reasoning would suggest that we should ascertain the results coincident with their presence.

To take only one illustration. It appears quite clear, from the evidence of Lamont and others, and is not disputed, that the greatest damage done to the trees was about the point named Pheasant Corner, which is said to be 500 yards from Incline No. 1, and 1200 yards from Incline No. 2, as to which it lies in the direct line of the prevailing wind. If, therefore, Dr Dittmar's experiment shews the presence of the greatest amount of sulphur at the point of the greatest amount of damage, it is reasonable to conclude that there is a connection between these facts. Now, Dr Dittmar's tables shew two results,—first, that the amount of sulphur ascertained in the month of February of each year, from October 1878 to February 1881, was largely greater than in any other month, following as it did on the three winter months of calcining; and, secondly, that in the month of February 1880—three years after the calcining commenced—the amount of sulphur disclosed at Pheasant Corner was the largest ascertained at any point at any time. It is not unreasonable to draw the inference that the sulphur, when it reached this point, was not innocuous.

The only other remark I shall make on the evidence relates to a view pressed on us by the defenders, founded on the fact that healthy trees were found side by side with trees which were injured. But I see no reason to suppose that such influences do not operate on vegetable life as analogous influences operate on animal life. The weaker and predisposed succumb, the stronger and less susceptible for a time resist. So Dr Dittmar found in his greenhouse experiment. Only a percentage of the plants was destroyed, although doubtless, had his experiment continued, all must in the end have perished.

On the evidence, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the injury which the pursuer says he has suffered, and that which he says he has reason to anticipate, have been sufficiently established by the evidence. Of course, there are many points to which I have not alluded, and necessarily could not allude, in this mere summary of the main results. I am also of opinion that these are directly the result of the defenders' operations in the calcination of ironstone close to his boundary. If this be so, I do not doubt that he is entitled to the remedy of interdict. His interest is not to be measured even by his present loss. If the view I have taken of the facts be correct, he has to contemplate

July 20, 1881.
Ingليس v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

the total destruction of his plantations as ornamental timber. There is no reason to suppose that what has taken place everywhere else will not occur here. The conifers, no doubt, being the most susceptible, will give way the soonest ; but experience seems to shew that the hardwood trees will follow, and that their destruction also is only a question of time. Against this result I think he has a reasonable claim to be protected.

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Ingilis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

No question of law was raised before the Lord Ordinary ; but we have had from the bar, on the reclaiming note, a long and able argument to shew that, assuming the facts to be as the Lord Ordinary has found them, the defenders have only done with their own property what they were entitled to do, whatever injury they may have caused to the pursuer ; and that these operations, undertaken entirely for their own profit and for that of the proprietor, possess a quasi exceptional character, which ought to protect them from being stopped, whatever obligation of damage their results might infer.

This is, of course, a well-worn theme ; but the law on the subject is not doubtful, nor do I think the present by any means a difficult example.

The general rule is, that every one is bound so to use his property as not to injure his neighbour. It is equally certain that this rule may suffer modifications according to the varied considerations of social life. Things which are forbidden in a crowded urban community may be permitted in the country. What is prohibited in enclosed land may be tolerated in the open. Vicinity—close proximity—may make that a nuisance which may cease to be so at a distance ; and the habit and practice of the neighbourhood has also some weight in cases of this kind. Nor, in extreme cases, do I doubt that the comparative interests at stake may be taken into view.

But I do not think the facts of the present case make it necessary to apply any of these modifying rules. The simple ground of complaint in this case relates, not to any use which the defenders make of their own property, but to the use which they make of the atmosphere as it passes over them, by injecting into it noxious vapours, which prevent it reaching the pursuer in purity, and cause damage to his property. The law on this subject was fully discussed and settled in the case of a running stream, in the action against the papermakers on the Esk. The analogy of the atmosphere may not be in all respects complete, inasmuch as the rights of riparian proprietors in water-runs are more capable of definition and appropriation than those in the purity of the atmosphere. But in the case of injury to health by polluting the air the regulating principles are precisely the same, and we so applied them in the recent case of Fraser v. Cran, 4 R. 794 ; and injury to property, although admitting, as I have said, of some qualifications, substantially follows the same rule. The cases relating to brick-burning in urban or suburban districts, several of which have been decided by the Courts in England, were instances mainly of annoyance and discomfort ; but the judgment in the case of Bamford v. Turnley, 31 L. J., Q. B. 286, has substantially set the law on that subject on an explicit footing, and the opinion of Baron Bramwell in that case proceeds on principles which are conclusive of the present.

It is true that if we continue the interdict which the Lord Ordinary has granted these mineral lessees may be exposed to inconvenience, and even to loss. But I cannot hold in the present case that this consideration can justify the continuance of the wrong. It was very truly said by Lord Justice James in a recent case, that when large interests are at stake persons should not stand on their extreme rights. I am quite of that opinion, but the sentiment seems

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Ingilis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

to tell against the defenders. There is no attempt to shew, on the proof, that the operations of the defenders might not be carried on at other points of the estate of Penicuik, without doing any injury to the pursuer's property, or other conterminous proprietors. The evidence is left a blank upon that subject, and there are no facts upon which we can come to a conclusion on it. But it is manifest that any difficulty on this head is entirely the voluntary act of the proprietor of the minerals, and the defenders, his lessees. Their lease covers an area upwards of three miles in extent, measuring from the pursuer's boundary, besides the minerals in the adjoining property of Logan Bank. I have looked into these leases, and their provisions afford a very instructive commentary on what the parties to them believed to be the character and effect of calcining. As regards Logan Bank, the defenders are prohibited by their lease to calcine on any part of the lands. By their lease from the proprietor of Penicuik they are prohibited from calcining on more than one-half of the area I have mentioned,—that is to say, on an area of nearly two miles in length; and although the portion on which they are not debarred from calcining extends to more than a mile from the pursuer's boundary, they have chosen to set down these calcining heaps within a couple of hundred yards of the pursuer's property, at points at which the width of the grounds narrows to about 300 yards. But these are voluntary acts. It is certain, at least for anything that appears, that the proprietor of Penicuik could not justify the works complained of on the pretext that he could not carry on the operations elsewhere. Nor do I think he could, by interposing a tenant, and introducing these restrictions into his lease, obtain the full value of his minerals, and save his own woods at the expense of his neighbour. It is not, in my opinion, a reasonable arrangement between landlord and tenant in a mineral lease to exempt practically nine-tenths of the surface of the mineral field, and all positions where such operations might injure the landlord, and to select for these deleterious operations a mere corner close to their neighbour's land, to the prejudice of one to whom they can yield no profit.

LORD YOUNG.—The defenders are tenants of the minerals in the lands of Penicuik, belonging to Sir George Clerk, and of Logan Bank, belonging to Mr Maxwell Ingilis. The pursuer is proprietor of Glencorse, which marches with both, and of Belwood, which adjoins Glencorse on the west. The defenders have for some time been calcining, at a place called Incline No. 1, ironstone won from both Penicuik and Logan Bank, and at places called Incline No. 2, and New Hearths, ironstone won, as I understand, from Penicuik only. The pursuer complains of the calcining at all these places as a nuisance to his properties of Glencorse and Belwood, and seeks to restrain it by interdict accordingly. The nuisance alleged is injury to trees and hedges from the smoke. By an arrangement, referred to on record, the calcining has since 1878 been limited to the months of November, December, and January. The question regards calcining in these months only—whether it occasions a nuisance to the pursuer.

There is a residence on Glencorse, and also on Belwood, both let, and I think it must be assumed that with respect to these there is no nuisance, for there was no attempt to prove any, and it appears that the residence on Glencorse has recently been let for an increased rent to a tenant who makes no complaint. Neither has any attempt been made to prove injury to herbage or crops. Indeed, no inmate of either residence, and no agricultural tenant or cultivator were called. Further, there is no evidence of injury to deciduous trees, which, I understood it to be admitted, were not liable to injury from smoke (in the quantity found), between November and January. The controversy in fact regards only the conifers—were they injured by smoke or not? On this question the evidence is voluminous, and so contradictory that one could not, I think, greatly hesitate to answer the question differently according as the witnesses on the one side or the other were relied on. I should myself have thought, although I desire to speak diffidently, being aware that your Lordships think otherwise, that the question was a fitting one to be tried by a jury.

Of the three properties owned by the pursuer, two, I think, may be laid out of view as of no account in the case,—House of Muir, inasmuch as it is admitted that no damage has been done to it; and Belwood, inasmuch as it is not proved, at least in my opinion, that any damage has been done to it. The firs planted by the pursuer himself, and to the condition of which the evidence is almost exclusively confined, are on Glencorse, and the substantial question of fact in the case regards them only. It is, I think, proved that, since 1877—i.e., since the commencement of the calcining complained of—a considerable number of these firs have manifested symptoms of bad health such as may be caused by any of several causes, and that many of them have died. With respect to some—I think not a few—of these unhealthy and dead firs, it is proved that their condition is not attributable to smoke from the defenders' calcining bings, but to natural causes. With respect to others again, and these in considerable number (though the evidence does not enable me to judge of the number even approximately), it is, I think, proved that smoke from the bing at Incline No. 1, which is in their immediate neighbourhood, is, if not the only cause, a material contributory cause of their condition.

Our only knowledge of the extent of the woodland on the property of Glencorse is such as we can collect from an inspection of the map, and the fact that it is worth £25 a-year for grazing, if cleared of trees. Throughout this woodland the firs in question were planted within the last twenty-five years. The unhealthiness and death undoubtedly proved extends throughout; and the pursuer has adduced evidence to shew that the pernicious effects of the smoke from the defenders' bings extends throughout, and is the true cause of the bad condition of the trees, at least generally and for the most part. I cannot say that this has been proved to my satisfaction. I think, on the contrary, that it is proved that other causes operated extensively; and that with respect to the parts of the property at a distance from the calcining bings these other causes were not materially aided by the smoke. The smoke is from coal fires, and no otherwise noxious than smoke from any fires in which coal is burnt. It is in greater volumes than smoke from house chimneys, and given off at a lower level, but it is the same smoke. The noxious ingredient is sulphur—the percentage of which, in this particular coal, is exceptionally low. Now, the generation of such smoke at calcining bings is, and has long been, of common occurrence, and it is reasonable to expect that the effect of it, and the distance to which it operates on vegetation in the neighbourhood, and particularly on conifer trees, should be known and capable of being shewn by the evidence of actual experience. There is, accordingly, such evidence in this case, and it is generally to the effect that, while a calcining bing is injurious to vegetation in the immediate vicinity, it has little effect beyond 200 yards, and none at all

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Ingilis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

No. 182. beyond 400 yards. This testimony of experience is, I think, confirmed by the scientific evidence—or perhaps I should rather say confirms it. There is, as I have said, evidence of the existence and operation (to a considerable extent admitted by the pursuer's witnesses) of other causes sufficient and likely to injure and kill young fir trees at the various places where they in fact suffered; and having regard to that evidence on the one hand, and on the other to the experimental and scientific evidence to which I have just referred as to the distance at which calcining bings are injurious to trees, I am unable to say that it is proved to my satisfaction that the unhealthiness and death of trees beyond 400 yards from the bings is attributable to them. I think it not immaterial to notice that Mr Barron, one of the pursuer's witnesses, who has experience of the effects of smoke from calcining and cokeing bings, although some of his language is rather vague and indefinite with respect to distances, practically confined his evidence to the immediate neighbourhood of Incline No. 1, and took all his specimens, whether for exhibition or his own examination and consideration, within a distance of 200 yards of it.

July 20, 1881.
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

But if 400 yards, or even twice that distance, be taken as reasonably safe, there is an end of the case with respect to Incline No. 2 and New Hearths, for I have already observed that there is, in my opinion, no proof of injury to Belwood, and the notion of prohibiting calcining within two miles or one mile cannot be sustained.

With respect to Incline No. 1, I am of opinion, as I have said, that the calcining operations there have, in fact, been prejudicial to a number of conifers (Norway firs and spruces) on the pursuer's property of Glencorse. In the state of the evidence this cannot be affirmed with absolute certainty, for it is possible that the proved condition of the trees may be the effect of other causes which are shewn, as I think, to have produced similar effects where the smoke from the bing did not operate. But that smoke being itself a sufficient cause of the proved effect, and likely to produce it within a distance of from 200 to 400 yards, I think it reasonable within that distance to attribute the effect to it, and to take the case on that footing accordingly.

So taking it, the question of law is, whether there is here such nuisance and injury to the pursuer's property as to entitle him to the remedy he asks? I do not regard this as a simple question in the sense of being easily answered. The defenders are certainly not at liberty to cause avoidable damage to the pursuer or any other adjoining proprietor,—that is to say, avoidable consistently with the reasonable exercise of their own legal rights at suitable or convenient places within their own bounds. It follows from what I have already said that with respect to Incline No. 2 and New Hearths the action fails on the facts—no damage being done by them to the pursuer's property. With respect to Incline No. 1, by which I think damage is done, my doubt is about the reasonableness of calcining at that place, even in the winter months—for to the extent of confining the operations to that season the defenders have yielded to the injunction sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas. It was explained at the bar that the minerals of Logan Bank and Penicuik crop out there, and that the consequence of interdicting the working and calcining them would be to sacrifice a considerable part of the mineral field. But although there is some evidence on this subject it is slight, and I cannot say satisfactory. On the other hand, the pursuer does not, as I understand, suggest that No. 1, as a place of working and calcining, was not properly selected with reference to the legitimate interests of the mineral field, and could be abandoned without a great sacrifice to the defenders and their landlords, or that it is an inconvenient place otherwise than with reference to the wellbeing of the fir trees in the neighbourhood. In the circumstances, and considering the decision that is about to be pronounced, it is probably an idle thing for me to pursue this topic. I should, however, wish to say for myself that I think the legality of an act, and the reasonableness of doing it at the particular place, is to be taken account of, and may be sufficient to defend it, notwithstanding that it causes damage to a neighbouring property. The nature and extent of the damage are, of course, to be considered, on the one hand, as well as the nature and extent of the proprietary interests sought to be sacrificed in order to avoid it, on the other. It is according to the evidence that iron ore, such as that here in question, must be calcined at the pit-head where it is brought to the surface, and that a field of such ore cannot in fact be worked on other terms. I cannot assent to the contention that it is necessarily sufficient for the pursuer's case that he has proved damage to his fir trees such as would entitle him to protection and remedy against a wrongdoer. I think magnitudes and proportions are to be considered, and also whether or not the defenders have acted with a reasonable regard to their neighbours' interests in selecting the places for operations which are in themselves quite legitimate. I am not prepared to hold that the case is made out with respect to Incline No. 1, although, had my views on the case generally prevailed, I should have been prepared to allow further evidence regarding it—not as causing damage or not, but as being or not being a convenient and reasonably chosen place for working and calcining, having regard to the defenders' legitimate interests as well as those of the pursuer.

No. 182.

July 20, 1881.
Inglis v.
Shotts Iron
Co.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I differ from the opinion which has just been delivered by my brother Lord Young, and concur with that which has been given by your Lordship in the chair. This case has received from me very anxious consideration since the argument was taken on the reclaiming note. I have not prepared a written opinion setting forth the result at which I have arrived, or the reasons which have led me to that result; but your Lordship was good enough to allow me an opportunity of reading the opinion which had been previously prepared by your Lordship, and I became so satisfied with the views of the case you presented that it appeared to me to be necessary only to adopt your Lordship's reasons and conclusions. Therefore, my Lord, for the conclusions at which I have arrived, I refer to the opinion you have delivered.

THE COURT adhered.

INGLIS & ALLAN, W.S.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

DUNCAN WRIGHT AND OTHERS, Suspenders.—Taylor Innes. No. 183.
HON. G. A. H. G. O. ELPHINSTONE AND HUSBAND, Respondents.—Pearson.
Parish—Churchyard.—Held by Lord Adam, Ordinary, that certain persons, being heritors and parishioners, were entitled to interdict to prevent another heritor from converting the family mausoleum in an old parish churchyard into an Episcopal chapel. *July 20, 1881.
Wright, &c. v. Lady Elphinstone.

IN August 1880 Duncan Wright and others, heritors and parishioners in the parish of Tulliallan, presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Honourable Georgina Augusta Henrietta Godolphin Osborne OUTER-HOUSE Lord Adam. M.

* Decided March 16, 1881.

No. 183. Elphinstone, commonly called Lady William Godolphin Osborne Elphinstone, wife of the Honourable Lord William Godolphin Osborne Elphinstone, residing at Tulliallan Castle, Kincardine-on-Forth, and the said Lord William Godolphin Osborne Elphinstone, as administrator-in-law for his said wife, and as an individual, praying the Court to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said respondents, or either of them, from interfering with, or proceeding to occupy and use, for the purpose of building a church or chapel for Episcopal services, the burying-ground in the churchyard of Overtown, in the parish of Tulliallan and county of Perth, or any part thereof.

July 20, 1881.
Wright, &c. v.
Lady Elphinstone.

The suspenders averred;—(Stat. 2) “The parish church of Tulliallan originally stood on the edge of the old road leading from Kincardine ferry to Perth, and about one and a half miles north from the town of Kincardine. It was surrounded in the usual way by the parish churchyard. The church was afterwards removed about a mile nearer to the river Forth, and a new churchyard formed, but the old churchyard, known by the name of Overtown, continued to be, and to be used as, the parish churchyard, and it has been for centuries a burying-place for the parish of Tulliallan. It is still used for the purpose of interments by the parishioners, and these take place from time to time.” (Stat. 4) “Early in the present year the complainers ascertained that the respondents, or one or other of them, proposed to erect a church or chapel in the said churchyard, and to use the same for the purpose of ordinary public worship, in accordance with the forms in use among the body of Dissenters known as Scotch Episcopalians. In carrying out this design it is believed and averred that the respondents intend wrongously to interfere with the solum of the churchyard and the graves of different parties, and to remove tombstones and other monuments, to make room for the intended church or chapel.”

The suspenders pleaded;—1. The respondents having no right or title to use the churchyard for the erection of a chapel, the prayer of the complainers ought to be granted. 2. The erection of an Episcopalian chapel not being a proper or legal use of a parish churchyard, the prayer of the complainers ought to be granted. 3. The proposed erection being an invasion of the rights of the complainers as heritors and parishioners their prayer ought to be granted, with expenses.

The respondents made the following answer to Stat. 4 above quoted:—(Ans 4.) “Denied, subject to the following explanations. The respondents, who are members of the Episcopal Church, propose to make an addition of 18 feet in length to the existing mausoleum, in which the late Lord Keith, father of the respondent, Lady William Godolphin Osborne Elphinstone, and certain other of her Ladyship’s relatives, have been interred, in order to adapt the same for use as a place for worship for themselves and the members of their household according to the forms of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, there being no Episcopal chapel nearer than three and a half miles from Tulliallan Castle. No graves or tombstones in which the complainers or any of them are interested will be in any way interfered with by the said operations, which necessitate the removal of only one tombstone, and that of great age, and illegible through decay.”

They also averred;—(Stat. 1.) “In and prior to 1673 a small church stood in Overtown churchyard, and was used for Episcopal service according to the form then recognised by the State. To this church there was attached a small burial-place, which is believed to have been then used for the interment of residents in the barony of Tulliallan, now the property of the respondents.” (Stat. 2.) “In or shortly after 1673, the barony of Kincardine, and certain other lands now in great part the property of the respondents, were disjoined from the parish of Culross and annexed to the parish of Tulliallan, which parish, prior to 1673, only included the barony of Tulliallan. In consequence of the increased extent of the parish a new church was built in 1675 in the village of Tulliallan (about a mile and quarter distant from the said old church), and a churchyard of considerable extent, given off from the Tulliallan estate, was attached thereto, in which burials have regularly taken place down to the present time, and which has ever since been the churchyard of the parish." (Stat. 4.) "The new churchyard opened in 1675 was intended to supersede, and did in fact supersede, the Overtown burial-place, as the churchyard of the parish; and the latter, which is wholly surrounded by the respondents' lands, thereupon ceased to be regularly used, and the church fell into ruin."

No. 183.
—
July 20, 1881.
Wright, &c. v.
Lady Elphinstone.

The respondents pleaded;—1. The complainers have no title to insist in the present application. 2. The ground in question being the property of the respondents, and, separatim, no right of the complainers being interfered with or injuriously affected by the proposed operations, the note should be refused, with expenses. 3. The said ground not being now the parish churchyard, and not having been so for more than two centuries, the note should be refused.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor* :—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the proof adduced, and

* "OPINION.—. . . I propose to limit my judgment to the real question at issue, viz., that involved in the first branch of the case as to the right of Lady Elphinstone to erect a chapel in what is called the churchyard of Overtown, and to use it for the purpose of public worship according to the Episcopalian form.

"Now, in regard to the evidence in this case, I do not think there is any reasonable doubt, or that it is matter of dispute, that this churchyard was, prior to 1672 or 1673, the burial-ground for the parish of Tulliallan. That being so, I am further of opinion, upon the evidence, that that ground has never been abandoned or given up, but has continued to be a parish churchyard. There is evidence before me that burials have been going on there ever since. In 1672 or 1673 a new churchyard was formed, and it necessarily followed that interments in the old original kirkyard would cease to be so numerous, and those that were made would relate to parties whose predecessors had been buried there, and that they alone would probably be the parties buried in the old churchyard. The younger parishioners would, I think, be buried in the newer churchyard, but which is now an old burying-place. I find from the plan of the old churchyard that there exist tombstones of all dates, and at various intervals, the last of them being so late as 1875. It was proved that in recent years three or four burials had taken place. That shews to me pretty conclusively that this old churchyard has never ceased to be anything but a churchyard. It was suggested by Mr Pearson that the Welchies were buried there by some private right or title of their own. It may be held, in connection with the old excambion, which is said to have taken place 200 years ago, that all the numerous people who appear to have been buried there since were buried in respect of some private right or title. I have no doubt that those existing tombstones represent only a tithe of the people buried there in that time. I am therefore of opinion, upon the evidence, that the old churchyard of Overtown was at one time the parish kirkyard of Tulliallan, and has continued to be so down to the present time. If it is assumed that this was once a parish churchyard,—and looking to the fact of all those people having been buried there I cannot take the suggestion that possibly there may have been some other right or title held by those persons,—I say that there is no evidence before me that this piece of ground has ever been abandoned or disused as one of the churchyards of the parish.

"Now, if that is so, I have no doubt, upon the law, as to the rights of

No. 183. considered the same, with the productions and whole process, Suspends the proceedings complained of, and interdicts, prohibits, and discharges

July 20, 1881.
Wright, &c. v.
Lady Elphinstone.

heritors, and the character in which they hold their title to the churchyard. It is not material in this question to inquire who are the heritors. Whoever they are, I think they hold the churchyards in trust for the parishioners, and are bound to see that they are administered for the purposes for which churchyards were instituted by the law of Scotland. I think the heritors have the fullest right of administration in connection with the churchyards and the tombstones which may be erected in them. They can prevent even the erection of a mausoleum, if they think fit, or anything that interferes with the free use of the churchyard. But it is quite a different matter to say that the whole of the heritors can combine together—or that one can do it with the approval of the others—to use the churchyard for purposes foreign to it. No consent of the whole heritors can authorise such a step, because that would be a breach of trust, and that is really what this case comes to. If it is a breach of trust, then I hold that the parishioners, and I should think also those parties having land in the parish, although they may not at the moment reside in the parish, would be entitled to interfere; they are entitled to do so, if there is a misuse by the heritors as trustees of the property under their charge. Therefore, if this be a parish churchyard,—as I think it is,—it humbly appears to me that the suspenders here have a title to come forward and say,—You shall not apply the churchyard, which you hold for us and our successors, to purposes inconsistent with churchyard uses. Mr Pearson suggested that they had no right to interfere by way of interdict,—that they were bound to bring a declarator. Now, that would have been a very appropriate mode of determining the rights of parties; but if the fact be as stated, it humbly appears to me that it lay on Mr Pearson's clients to bring such a declarator. It is contended that,—presumably by excambion,—Lady Elphinstone or her predecessors had originally right to this ground, and now have right to it. It may be so; all I say is that it lies on them to prove their right. I am of opinion that the parishioners, seeing Lady Elphinstone disturbing the existing state of the churchyard, were quite entitled to interfere. I therefore think that there is nothing in the objection that the proceedings here on the part of the suspenders should have been by way of declarator. Now, in regard to another point, there is no doubt at all as to what the object of the proceeding is, because the respondents set out, in their 4th answer, that 'the respondents, who are members of the Episcopal Church,' &c. (reads). One can understand why this particular site should be selected by the respondents for the erection of an Episcopal chapel. I do not think it matters a straw whether the building to which an addition is proposed to be made is called a mausoleum; I do not think that makes the least difference. It would have been the same though there had been no mausoleum there at all, and the respondents were simply proposing to erect for the first time an Episcopal chapel in what I think is the parish churchyard. Mr Pearson suggested that the purpose only is objected to. In one sense that is quite true; but there is also the question whether the erection of the building is legal. If Lady Elphinstone proceeds to use the existing building, it may be for an illegal purpose. The building, as I think, is not to be used in connection with the purposes of the churchyard, but is to be used for a purpose quite foreign. It appears to me that whether a building interferes with access to the graveyard, or with the tombstones in the graveyard, is nothing to the point. I do not see why a heritor, who, in my humble opinion, is in no better position in this case than any other heritor, has any more right to build an Episcopal chapel than Mr Welch, in respect of his lair, had to build a Presbyterian church (if he be of that persuasion) over the remains of his ancestors, or than any other party in similar circumstances. I think the proceeding in question is a diversion, on the part of the trustees of this churchyard, from its proper purpose as a churchyard, and I think it is a breach of trust on the part of Lady Elphinstone. If the remaining heritors of the parish do not choose to come forward and say, You are not to do this, then I think the petitioners here are quite entitled to come the respondents, or either of them, from interfering with, or proceeding to occupy and use, for the purpose of building a church or chapel for Episcopal services, the burying-ground in the churchyard of Overtown, in the parish of Tulliallan and county of Perth, or any part thereof, and decerns: Finds it unnecessary to dispose further, in the meantime, of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict: Finds the complainers entitled to expenses, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax, and report."

No. 183.
July 20, 1881.
Wright, &c. v.
Lady Elphinstone.

CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

THE UNITED INCORPORATION OF MASONS AND WRIGHTS OF HADDINGTON, No. 184.
Petitioners.—A. J. Young.

Nobile officium—Stat. 9 and 10 Vict. (Exclusive Trading in Burghs Act, 1846), cap. 17, secs. 1, 2, and 3—Application of funds of incorporation nearly extinct—Procedure.—An ancient Incorporation of Masons and Wrights of burgh, which had formerly the privilege of exclusive trading, having become almost extinct, a petition was presented to the Court, under the 3d section of the Exclusive Trading in Burghs Act, 1846, to have certain resolutions as to the future application of the funds approved of. The Court remitted the resolutions to the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and upon his report approved of the resolutions as amended by him.

July 20, 1881.*

The United
Incorporation of Masons and Wright of Haddington.

Resolutions approved of by the Court in the above circumstances.

THE UNITED INCORPORATION OF MASONS AND WRIGHTS OF THE BURGH 2D DIVISION. OF HADDINGTON was a body founded many centuries ago for the purpose of carrying on these trades exclusively in that burgh. The Act of 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, for the abolition of the exclusive privilege of trading in burghs in Scotland, having been passed in 1846, the membership of the incorporation fell off greatly, and in January 1881 there was only one forward and do it. If Lady Elphinstone has acquired a right of property in this churchyard it will be different; she may then do whatever she likes. It has been suggested that she has acquired such a right of property, but there is no proof of it whatever, so far as I can see. It has been said that in the year 1672 or 1673 a new church was built, and a new churchyard formed round it; that there must have been an excambion or something of that kind, but of which there is no trace,—some excambion whereby Lady Elphinstone acquired a right of property, which, admittedly, she did not possess before in this churchyard. I say there is no evidence of there having been any such excambion. I think the presumption is all the other way, because I think the future history of the churchyard shews that the parishioners just used it, as before, for carrying on their interments. The whole case turns upon the leading question whether this was in the old days, before the Reformation and downwards, a parish churchyard. I think it was a parish churchyard, and has never been anything else than a parish churchyard. It may be a mere sentimental objection that the parishioners in this parish should interfere with the erection of an Episcopal church, and the carrying on of Episcopal services, in the midst of what, I think—and of what they think—is an existing churchyard belonging to the parishioners. I can only say it is a sentiment in which I should be very much inclined to share. Assuming always that this churchyard belongs to the Church of Scotland, I can quite sympathise with the opinions of those parishioners who do not desire that Episcopal services should be carried on in such a place. Therefore, I think that the suspenders are entitled to interdict in terms of the first part of the prayer, and that it is unnecessary to dispose of the remaining points."

M.

* Interlocutor pronounced 7th June 1881.

No. 184. member of the body resident in Scotland, although one or two other members were believed to be alive and resident abroad.

July 20, 1881.
The United
Incorporation of Masons and Wrights of Haddington.

The accumulated funds at that date amounted to about £120, and the incorporation also owned house property of the value of £400. Under their former practice, and in virtue of a charter granted to them by the Magistrates and Town-Council of Haddington in 1647, "the incorporation was empowered to apply its funds for the help of decayed freemen of the craft and their wives and children, and any other necessary uses belonging to the craft. The relief afforded to such widows of members as were in poor circumstances was a payment of about £2 each per annum. For a time there were generally four or five widows in receipt of that relief, but latterly the number had fallen to two. After these payments, as well as taxes, repairs, and other expenses have been met, the funds had been regularly accumulated in bank."

Section 3 of the Act above referred to provided that where incorporations fell into such a state as has been above described, it should be lawful for the incorporation to apply to the Court of Session by summary petition to sanction such bye-laws and regulations as might be proposed to meet the circumstances of the case.

Andrew Dickson, the sole surviving resident member of the incorporation, being desirous to obtain the approval and sanction of the Court for an application of the funds beyond that hitherto in use, presented, on 25th January 1881, a summary petition to the Second Division of the Court of Session, in which he set forth the state of the incorporation, and the following resolutions, to which he desired the sanction of the Court:—

"That the funds of the incorporation ought to be applied by the members of the incorporation who are now alive, or who may be assumed or admitted into it, along with David Stevenson, provost; John Hislop, William M'Kay, and Andrew Wood, bailies; Andrew Beatson, Dean of Guild; and Alexander Mouat, treasurer,—all of the royal burgh of Haddington, and their successors in their respective offices above mentioned, for the following purposes:—1. In payment of taxes, repairs, and other necessary burdens and expenses. 2. To meet the charitable purposes authorised by the said gift or charter, with an increase of £2 per annum on the sum now paid annually to each widow, and the claims of any surviving member in destitute circumstances, wherever residing, having a preference. 3. To pay, or assist in paying, the school-fees of such children or grandchildren of parents, or deceased parents, of the incorporation resident in and attending the public schools of the burgh as are deserving of assistance. 4. For the promotion of secondary education in the burgh of Haddington, either by means of a bursary or bursaries, to children attending the public secondary school of the burgh of Haddington, or towards payment of the salaries of the teachers, or towards payment of the expense of appliances in connection with the school, for which assessment cannot be levied on the burgh by Act of Parliament."

The Court, on 16th February 1881, remitted to Mr J. Balfour Paul, advocate, to consider the petition, and report.

On 23d April 1881 Mr Paul lodged his report, approving in the main of the proposed resolutions.¹

¹ Counsel for the petitioners referred to the following similar petitions which had been before the Court:—Guilddry Incorporation of Arbroath, July 5, 1856, 18 D. 1207; Incorporation of Wrights of Leith, June 4, 1856, 18 D. 981; Skinners of Glasgow, Dec. 4, 1857, 20 D. 211; also Incorporation of Tailors of Glasgow, before the First Division in July 1880.

ON 7th June 1881 the Court pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Ap- No. 184. prove of said bye-laws, regulations, or resolutions as hereby amended, and which bye-laws, regulations, or resolutions as thus July 20, 1881.
 amended are as follows, viz.—‘ That the income of the incorpora- The United tion ought to be applied by the incorporation, or, when the mem- Incorporation bers thereof resident within the parliamentary bounds of the of Masons and burgh of Haddington shall be under twelve in number, then by Wrights of such members, if any, along with the Provost, Bailies, Dean of Haddington.
 Guild, and Treasurer of the royal burgh of Haddington for the time being ; and in case it shall happen at any time that there is no member of the incorporation resident within the said parliamentary boundary, then, and so long as this state of things shall last, by the said Provost, Bailies, Dean of Guild, and Treasurer, for the following purposes, in their order—(1) in payment of taxes, repairs, and other necessary burdens and expenses ; (2) to meet the charitable purposes authorised by the gift or charter granted by the Magistrates and Town-Council of the burgh of Haddington on 25th September 1647, of new erecting and creating the incorporation,—that is to say, to make allowances to members in destitute circumstances, and the widows and children of deceased members who have been left or at the time are in destitute circumstances, subject, however, to the declaration that the allowance to each widow may be increased to the extent of £2 per annum beyond what has formerly been allowed, provided this increase shall not diminish the fund requisite for the allowance to be paid to destitute members ; (3) to pay, or assist in paying, the school-fees of such children or grandchildren of deceased members of the incorporation as may stand in need of such assistance, the expediency of such payment in particular cases being left to the determination of those at the time in the administration of the funds of the incorporation ; (4) for the promotion of secondary education in the burgh of Haddington by means of a bursary or bursaries to children attending the public secondary school of the royal burgh of Haddington, or towards payment of the salaries of the teachers thereof, or towards payment of the expense of appliances in connection with the school or schools, if any, for which assessment cannot be levied on the burgh by Act of Parliament, and decern.”

J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—Agent.

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME VIII.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.

Cases decided in the Court of Justiciary will be found under the head

JUSTICIARY CASES.

See separate Index for cases decided in the Registration Appeal Court, p. 1092.

ABANDONMENT OF ACTION BY NOT PROCEEDING TO TRIAL WITHIN TWELVE MONTHS OF ISSUES BEING ADJUSTED. See Process, 9.

ACQUIESCENCE. See Lease, 2.

ADOPTION. See Bill, 4.

ADVOCATE, LORD. See Husband and Wife, 6—Sheriff.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Proof—Proof pro ut de jure of agreement to qualify contract of employment—Agent's right to recover fees—Notary-public.

1. In an action by a notary-public, who paid attorney-tax, but was not otherwise a qualified law-agent, against a firm of money-lenders for payment for professional services in collecting debts, protesting bills, &c., the money-lenders averred that by a verbal agreement entered into before the notary-public was employed it was expressly stipulated that he was to get no remuneration except what he could extract from the debtors. The pursuer pleaded that such an agreement could only be proved by writ or oath. The Sheriff allowed a proof at large, and on considering the evidence held the agreement proved. On appeal the Court adhered to his judgment. Moscip v. O'Hara, Spence, & Co., Oct. 23, 1880, p. 36.

Employment—Law-Agents Act, 1873 (Stat. 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 21—Prescription—Reference to Oath.

2. In an action by Edinburgh law-agents against a person in Glasgow for an account of expenses incurred by them in conducting an action in the Court of Session in his name on the instructions of a Glasgow law-agent, the defender pleaded (1) prescription, and (2) that he had not employed the pursuers. The plea of prescription having been sustained, the pursuers referred the matter to the defender's oath. He deponed that he had not employed the Glasgow agent; that he did not know of the action in the Court of Session until after it had been commenced; that when told of it he informed the Glasgow agent that if he went on with it he must do so on his own responsibility and his own risk, and that he had not employed the pursuers. Held that the oath was negative of the reference. M'Larens v. M'Dougall, March 16, 1881, p. 626.

Reparation.

3. Circumstances in which the Court held a law-agent bound to repay to a client a sum invested under the agent's advice on a heritable security. Ronaldson, &c. v. Drummond & Reid, June 7, 1881, p. 767.

AGENT AND CLIENT—Continued.Commission—Expenses—Taxation.

4. When a law-agent employs an auctioneer or other person to do work on behalf of a client he is bound to credit the client with any discount or donation he may receive from the person so employed. Ronaldson, &c. v. Drummond & Reid, July 15, 1881, p. 956.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Bill of Exchange—Acceptance “per pro.”—Liability of principal.

1. B., M., & Co., a firm of merchants in Hamburg, in 1869 opened a branch of their business in Dundee under the charge of an agent H, in whose favour they executed a power of attorney authorising him to sign letters, deeds, bills, &c., “per procuration” of the firm. The power of attorney was lodged with the A bank, where the firm kept its account, and where the bills of the firm were domiciled. On 1st September 1879 the firm put an end to the agency, and arranged that thereafter goods purchased by H should be bought on his own account, and sold by him to the firm. Subsequently the B bank, in the knowledge of these facts, discounted bills drawn after 1st September 1879 by a firm of which H was known to be a partner, and bearing H's signature as acceptor per pro. of B., M., & Co.

In an action for payment brought by the B bank against B., M., & Co., it was proved that since the termination of the agency the power of attorney had remained in the hands of the A bank, and that H had been allowed to endorse by his own signature, per pro. of B., M., & Co., foreign bills payable to B., M., & Co. which they had forwarded unendorsed in payment of his accounts, and that on three occasions he had been allowed to draw cheques per pro. of B., M., & Co. upon their account in London. It was also proved that the bills sued on were not granted with B., M., & Co.'s authority or for their behoof.

Held that the B bank having discounted the bills in the knowledge that the agency had ceased, had proceeded at their own risk, and that B., M., & Co. were not liable to pay the amount of the bills.

Opinions as to the duty devolving on a person discounting bills signed per pro. to inquire into the extent of the agent's mandate.

Question, whether a bill signed per pro. by an agent, authorised to do so, is binding upon the principal where signed fraudulently. Opinion per Lord Rutherford Clark that it is binding. North of Scotland Banking Co. v. Behn, Möller, & Co., Jan. 21, 1881, p. 423.

Stockbroker—Sale of stock and closing of customer's account—Misrepresentation by customer as to means and credit.

2. Held that where a stockbroker has incurred personal responsibility by purchasing stock for a client on the faith of representations made by him as to his means, which proved not to be correct, and the client has refused to give satisfactory explanations or references, the stockbroker is entitled to realise the stock held for his client, and close the account. Risk v. Auld & Guild, May 27, 1881, p. 729.

See Ship, 3—Lease, 6.

AGREEMENTS AND CONTRACTS. Liquidate damages—Penalty—Time bargain.

1. In an action by a contractor for the balance of the contract price, the employer pleaded that he was entitled, in terms of the contract, to a deduction from the contract price of £2 per day for each day the work had remained unfinished after the date stipulated. Held that, in the circumstances, the various stipulations as to time being inconsistent with the work being completed on the date fixed, the claim as to liquidate damages could not be enforced.

Observations on penalties and liquidate damages. Robertson v. Driver's Trustees, March 2, 1881, p. 555.

Foreign—Locus solutionis.

2. The pursuers and defenders of an action in the Court of Session, who were themselves resident in Scotland, entered into a compromise of it, by which the defenders became bound (1) to grant a power of attorney to the pursuers' firm in Rangoon to sell certain property there, and to the extent of £4250 to retain the proceeds on behalf of the pursuers, and (2) in the event of the properties not realising the said sum then to pay the deficiency. The property was sold, and the price, which did not amount in any view to £4250, was paid in rupees. The value of the rupee in Rangoon was 2s. ; at the current rate of exchange with this country it was only 1s. 8d.

AGREEMENTS AND CONTRACTS—Continued.

A question having arisen whether the payment in rupees was to be credited as of its value in Rangoon or its value in England, held (diss. Lord Deas) that the payment was to be credited at its value in England—The Lord President and Lord Mure holding that Scotland was the locus solutionis—Lord Shand holding that although Rangoon was the locus solutionis the payment fell to be made in English money in terms of the contract. Ainslie, &c. v. Murrays, March 17, 1881, p. 636.

See Lease, 1—Agent and Client, 1—Partnership, 2.

ALIMENT. See Husband and Wife, 1.

ALIMENT, RESTRICTION OF. See Process, 6.

APPEAL TO HOUSE OF LORDS. Competency—Cause originating in Sheriff Court—Findings of fact—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV., c. 120), sec. 40.

In appeals falling within the scope of the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, the House of Lords has no concern with the proof led in the Sheriff Court. Where it can be shewn that the Court of Session has not exhausted the issue before it, and that there are material questions of fact left undetermined, a remit will be made to the Court below to pronounce findings upon these questions, but the omission can only be shewn by reference to the judgment and record, and not to the proof. The House of Lords will not remit on matters of fact which are not plainly set forth on record. Mackay v. Dick & Stevenson, March 7, 1881, H. L., p. 37.

APPROBATE AND REPROBATE. See Succession, 13.

ARBITRATION. Objections to decree—Arbiter applying for loan from parties-submitters.

An arbiter who was the intimate friend of both the parties-submitters having, during the dependence of the submission, become involved in financial difficulties, applied to each of the parties successively for a loan of £1000. The loan was refused by both parties, and the submission was proceeded with until a final award was pronounced. In an action of reduction of the award at the instance of one of the parties on the ground of legal corruption on the part of the arbiter in consequence of his acting in connection with the application for a loan, held that his application, although in the abstract liable to misconstruction, was not in itself corrupt, and decree of reduction refused accordingly. Morisons v. Thomson's Trustees, Nov. 26, 1880, p. 147.

ARCHITECT'S REMUNERATION. See Recompense.

ARRESTMENT. Furthcoming—Debenture bond in security for advances to be made—Competency—Companies Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 17), secs. 46, 47, 48, &c.

1. A railway company granted to a bank a debenture bond for £3000 in security for overdrafts which they wished to make. A creditor of the railway company arrested the sum represented by this bond in the hands of the bank. In an action of furthcoming at the instance of the creditor against the bank, held that there being no debt due by the bank to the railway company the action fell to be dismissed as incompetent. Miller v. Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Co. &c., Dec. 7, 1880, p. 220.

Bankruptcy—Arrestment on dependence of an action.

2. Arrestments used on the dependence of an action confer a preference although the defender be sequestrated before decree is obtained in the action, provided they be followed up without undue delay. Mitchell v. Scott (Moir's Trustee), June 29, 1881, p. 875.

ARRESTMENT—Continued.Arrestment—Judicial Factor—Factor loco absentis.

3. It is competent to arrest in the hands of a factor loco absentis funds belonging to his ward's estate. Ibid.

ARTICLES OF ROUP. See Sale of Heritage.

ASSESSMENT. See Police, 1.

AUCTIONEER. See Agent and Client, 4—Retention, 2.

BANK. Cheque—Refusal to cash cheque on ground of depositor's insolvency.

A bank which held on account current £413 belonging to an executry estate refused to cash a cheque for £100 drawn on the account, on the ground that the estate was insolvent, and that the bank, which had a claim for £130, intended to apply for sequestration of it. Held that the bank was not entitled to withhold payment of the cheque. Ireland v. North of Scotland Banking Co., Dec. 3, 1880, p. 215.

BANK STOCK. See Trust, 1.

BANKRUPTCY. Action of exhibition and transumpt—Trustee's power of recovering documents—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), secs. 90, 91, 92.

1. The trustee of a bankrupt brought an action against the bankrupt's father as sole trustee under his own antenuptial marriage-contract, under which the pursuer alleged that the bankrupt had a right of fee in certain properties, concluding for exhibition and transumpt of the writs and evidents. Held that the proper remedy of the trustee was to call for production of the writs he required under sections 90, 91, and 93 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1856, and action dismissed as unnecessary. Selkirk v. Service, Oct. 22, 1880, p. 29.

Sequestration—Mode of voting for winding up by deed of arrangement—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 35, 38, and 101.

2. In a sequestration the claimants who vote at a meeting under the 35th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, for a winding up by deed of arrangement must support their claims by affidavits and vouchers, as in the election of a trustee, and no one is entitled to have his vote reckoned in number whose claim does not amount to £20. North of Scotland Banking Co. v. Ireland, Nov. 20, 1880, p. 117.

Duties of Trustee—Deliverance upon claims where no dividend is declared—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 126 and 127.

3. Held, upon a construction of the 126th and 127th sections of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, that a trustee in bankruptcy ought not to proceed, under the 126th section, to examine the oaths and grounds of debt, or to issue any deliverance regarding claims, until he is in a position to declare a dividend, and, therefore, that a deliverance admitting a claim where no dividend was declared was no bar to the trustee reconsidering the claim and rejecting it by a subsequent deliverance. Monkhouse (M'Allum & Co.'s Trustee) v. Mackinnon (Hannay & Sons' Trustee), Jan. 28, 1881, p. 454.

Bankrupt's title to challenge rights granted by trustee—Discharged bankrupt's title depends on retrocession or abandonment by creditors.

4. A creditor held a bond over certain heritable subjects, which were not of sufficient value to pay the whole debt. The debtor having been sequestrated, a memorandum of agreement was entered into by the creditor and the trustee in the debtor's sequestration, under which the creditor gave up his right to rank for the unsecured part of his debt, and the trustee agreed to grant an absolute disposition of the subjects contained in the bond. This agreement was approved of by the creditors, and entered in the sederunt-book of the sequestration. The debtor was discharged without payment of a composition. The estate paid a dividend of 1s. 6d. in the £, and the trustee was subsequently discharged. He did not execute a disposition of the subjects in favour of the creditor. The creditor expended a large sum of money in completing the building on the subject which had been in progress at the date of sequestration, and drew the rents of the subject for twenty years. The debtor then raised an action to have it declared that the subjects still belonged to him.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Held that by the sequestration the debtor had been divested of his whole estate, and that by the agreement the trustee had conferred on the bondholder a personal right to the land, which the bankrupt had no title to challenge. Douglas v. MacLachlan, Feb. 4, 1881, p. 471.

Appeal against Sheriff's deliverance refusing sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 19, 31, 169, 170.

5. An appeal to the Court of Session is competent against a deliverance of a Sheriff refusing a petition for sequestration. Marr & Sons v. Lindsay, June 7, 1881, p. 784.

Bills—Lien—Pledge—Bills accepted against goods; bankruptcy of both drawer and acceptor while bills in hands of onerous holder; how goods to be dealt with—English rule of ex parte Waring considered.

6. When A accepts the drafts of B against B's goods in A's hands, if both A and B fail while the goods are still in A's hands, and the bills are in the circle, (1) the billholder is entitled to claim against the estate of each for the amount of the bill, to the effect of recovering on the whole full payment; (2) A's estate has a lien over the goods to the effect of entire relief and indemnification against any payments which A's estate may be required to make in respect of the bills; and (3) B's estate is entitled to demand the goods after such indemnification has been given out of the proceeds, or on full security being given to relieve A and his estate of the bills.

The English rule of ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, is inconsistent with the rules and principles of the Scotch bankruptcy system, and has not been adopted in Scotland.

In connection with an agreement, whereby A undertook to employ his works in spinning on hire for B, it was stipulated that A should be bound, if required, to grant his acceptances to B for a sum not exceeding three-fourths of the market value of the raw material and yarns held by him on account of B, and that he should be entitled to a right of lien or retention of goods to a value sufficient to cover such acceptances. It was also specially provided that all materials and yarns sent to A's works should continue to be the sole property of B, subject only to the lien of A for the advances which he might have made to B, or for debts which in any way B might be resting owing to him. Both A and B became bankrupt while bills to a large amount were in the circle in the hands of an onerous holder. At the date of his bankruptcy A held in his hands certain material and yarns belonging to B.

In a competition for the proceeds of these goods between A's trustee, B's trustee, and the billholder, held (1) that A's right under the above agreement was strictly that of pledgee, viz., to hold the goods in his hands at the time till relieved of his obligations under the bills, and to indemnify himself out of the proceeds for any payments which he might be required to make in respect of his acceptances, and that A's trustee was entitled to work out this indemnity in exactly the same way as A would himself have done had he remained solvent; (2) that the English rule of ex parte Waring whereby in similar circumstances the billholder is entitled to have the security subject applied directly in or towards payment of the bills, and to rank on the estates both of drawer and acceptor for any balance, had not been and could not be adopted in Scotland, as it was inconsistent with the rules and principles of the bankruptcy law of Scotland, and as, while conferring a gratuitous benefit on the billholder to which he had right neither by law nor contract, it would inflict injustice on the creditors of the acceptor by violating, to their prejudice, the agreement under which their debtor held the goods; and (3) that B's trustee was not entitled, in virtue of the title he acquired to B's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to have the goods delivered over to him subject to all claims against them to be established in the sequestration, but that the security being a real security by way of pledge A's trustee was entitled to retain them until the object of the pledge was fulfilled. Royal Bank of Scotland v. Commercial Bank of Scotland, &c., June 15, 1881, p. 805.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Insolvent expending funds in improving estate held in trust for children—Resulting trust.

7. In an action by the trustee on A's sequestrated estate against his trustees under an antenuptial marriage-contract the pursuer alleged that A, after he was insolvent, and knew that he was insolvent, expended large sums of money on an estate which he had conveyed to the trustees in security of the annuity provided under the contract for his widow and as a provision to his children, and concluded, inter alia, for declarator, that so far as the estate was benefited by A's expenditure, after the date when he was alleged to have become insolvent, the marriage-contract trustees held for behoof of the trustee in bankruptcy. Held that the pursuer's averments were relevant. Main (Fleming's Trustee) v. Fleming's Trustees, June 30, 1881, p. 880.

"Estate" under section 103 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856—School-master's salary.

8. The trustee on the sequestrated estate of a teacher in a burgh school presented a petition under the 103d section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, praying the Lord Ordinary to declare all right and interest which belonged or might belong to the bankrupt in the salary and emoluments of his office to belong to the trustee, until the bankrupt's debts should be paid, but subject to payment by the trustee to the bankrupt of a reasonable allowance for his maintenance.

Held that as the bankrupt held the office at the date of his sequestration the emoluments subsequently accruing therefrom were not "estate acquired by the bankrupt" after the date of his sequestration in the sense of section 103 of the Act, and petition dismissed.

Opinion (per Lord Fraser) that the section does not apply to fees earned by the personal labour of a bankrupt after the date of his sequestration. Barron v. Mitchell, July 6, 1881, p. 933.

Trustee—Report—Right of Trustee to withhold Report—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict., c. 79), sec. 146.

9. Held (diss. Lord Deas) that in a bankrupt's sequestration, when five months have elapsed from the date of the deliverance awarding sequestration, the trustee is not entitled to refuse, when required by the bankrupt, to deliver to him a report under sec. 146 of the above Act "in regard to the conduct of the bankrupt, and as to how far he has complied with the provisions" of the Act. Mather v. M'Kittrick (Mather's Trustee), July 14, 1881, p. 952.

Landlord and Tenant—Claim for rent against sequestrated bankrupt.

10. When the tenant of an urban subject has been sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act the landlord has a claim in the sequestration for the current year's rent, but no claim against the bankrupt, even although he may have been allowed to remain in possession from the date of sequestration to the end of the year. Fraser v. Robertson, Jan. 7, 1881, p. 347.

Trust-deed for creditors—Truster suing trustee to account—Caution for expenses.

11. An insolvent who had granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors held entitled to sue the trustee for an alleged balance without finding caution for expenses. Ritchie v. M'Intosh (Ritchie's Trustee), June 2, 1881, p. 747. See Bill, 1—Arrestment, 2—Sale, 3, 5, and 6—Process, 10.

BILL OF EXCHANGE Accommodation Bill—Blank stamp—Bankruptcy.

1. Held that a person who has obtained for his own accommodation a blank acceptance is barred by the acceptor's sequestration from making use of it thereafter. M'Meehin v. Russell and Tudhope, March 9, 1881, p. 587.

Blank stamp—Indorsee—Reparation—Damages—Wrongous use of Diligence.

2. In an action brought by the acceptor of a bill against the drawer and an indorsee, concluding for reduction of the bill, and damages, on the allegation that the bill had been signed blank by the pursuer, and delivered to the drawer for his accommodation prior to the pursuer's sequestration, and that the drawer had wrongously filled it up and indorsed it after the pursuer's sequestration, and that the indorsee had redelivered the bill to the drawer to enable him to obtain the pursuer's apprehension on a meditatione fugæ warrant which had followed, held that the pursuer had set forth a relevant case against the drawer of the bill, but not against the indorsee, as it was not averred that he knew that the bill had been delivered blank to the drawer for his accommodation prior to the sequestration of the acceptor. McMeekin v. Russell and Tudhope, March 9, 1881, p. 587.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—Continued.

Issue.

3. Forms of issues to try a question of wrongous filling up of and indorsation of a blank bill, and of wrongous apprehension and imprisonment on a meditatione fugæ warrant. Ibid.

Forgery—Adoption—Silence as a personal bar to disclaiming liability.

4. When a person comes to know that his signature has been forged to a bill mere delay on his part in giving notice of the forgery to the billholder will not necessarily imply adoption nor bar him from repudiating liability unless the billholder or others have been prejudiced by his silence.

A bill for £76, drawn by A, and bearing to be accepted by B and C, was discounted by the bank. It fell due on 10th April, and on Saturday 12th April the bank gave notice of dishonour to B, who lived at some distance from the office of the bank. On receiving the notice B did not inform the bank that his signature to the bill was a forgery, or communicate with them in any way. On Monday 14th April, without waiting for a reply from B, the bank allowed the bill to be retired by A, who paid £6 in cash and discounted another bill for £70, drawn by him and bearing to be accepted by the same B and C. This second bill fell due on 17th July, and the bank, on 14th, 18th, and 21st July, gave notices that it was coming due, and that it was overdue, to B. B made no reply to these notices until 29th July, when he informed the bank that his signature had been forged. Notwithstanding various suspicious circumstances, tending to shew knowledge and authorisation or adoption on the part of B, held (rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that it was not proved that B had authorised his name to be put to the bill, or had subsequently adopted the signature; and (2) that he was not barred by his silence from repudiating liability on 29th July, as the bank had been in no way injured by it. Mackenzie v. British Linen Co., Feb. 11, 1881, H. L., p. 8.

5. Bills accepted against goods—Bankruptcy of both drawer and acceptor while bills in hands of onerous holder; how goods to be dealt with—English rule of ex parte Waring considered. See Bankruptcy, 6.

See also Agent and Principal, 1.

BILL OF LADING. See Ship, 1, 2.BONA FIDE CONSUMPTION.

1. Opinions per Lord President and Lord Rutherford Clark that the plea of bona fide perception and consumption applies only in cases where a person has been in possession of a heritable subject upon an apparently good but invalid title, and has been evicted and is called to account for the rents. Opinions per Lord Mure and Lord Shand contra. Huntly's Trustees v. Hallyburton's Trustees, Nov. 5, 1880, p. 50.
2. B, an heir of entail, raised an action of count and reckoning against the representatives of A, a former heir of entail, for the proceeds of the timber which he was annually allowed to sell, on the ground that by the deed of entail he was bound to apply these in reduction of the capital debts secured on the estate. The defenders, besides maintaining that under his titles A was entitled to appropriate the proceeds of the wood sold, pleaded alternatively bona fide perception and consumption. Opinions per Lord Mure and Lord Shand that the plea of bona fide consumption was well founded. Opinions per Lord President and Lord Rutherford Clerk contra. Ibid.

BUILDING SOCIETY. See Friendly Society.

BURGH. Street—Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862 (25 Vict., cap. liii.), secs. 30 and 33—Private Street—Notice to owners sought to be made liable for assessment.

1. Where the Town-Council of Edinburgh, in terms of section 30 of the Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862, sent a notice to the "owners of lands and heritages" in a thoroughfare which was not a public street, requiring them to repair the carriage-way, and afterwards executed operations amounting to "the making up, constructing, and causewaying" of a street, and assessed the owners, against whom they brought an action for payment, held that the proceedings of the Town-Council were invalid, as they ought to have proceeded under section 33 of the statute, and defenders assailed accordingly.

Observations upon the meaning of the term "private street." Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Paterson, Dec. 3, 1880, p. 197.

Jurisdiction of Dean of Guild Court—Competition of heritable rights—Title must be ex facie apparent.

2. A party pleading want of jurisdiction in the Dean of Guild Court, on the ground that the question raised is one of right to heritable property, must set forth upon record an ex facie good title to the subjects. Pitman, &c. v. Burnett's Trustees, July 7, 1881, p. 914.

Property—Ground held by magistrates as golf links—Power of magistrates to divert use.

3. A piece of links ground was held by the magistrates and town-council of a burgh as burgh property, subject to the obligation of preserving it for the purposes of the game of golf. In 1820 the magistrates feued off a strip along the southern boundary of this piece of ground where it abutted on the high road. On this strip of ground houses were built facing the high road, and the actings of the magistrates not being timeously objected to, these feus came in course of time to be no longer in point of law part of the Links. Houses were afterwards built at the north end of these feus facing the part of the Links reserved by the magistrates, and access was obtained to them along the margin of the Links. This becoming cut up by traffic, the magistrates resolved to form a regular metalled road twenty-one feet wide on that part of the Links which adjoined these feus, for the general use of the public as well as the feuars. This was objected to as an encroachment on the rights of the inhabitants.

Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) that on the evidence adduced the formation of the proposed road would not in the meantime interfere with the use of the Links by the inhabitants as heretofore for the game of golf, and that therefore the magistrates were entitled in their administration of the burgh property to make the said road, but that the magistrates were bound to retain the road and the ground on which it was constructed subject to the same uses as any other portion of the Links, and to take such steps as might be necessary to prevent the acquisition by any person or persons of any rights over the same which might conflict with the right of the magistrates to take away or alter said road, or to restrict and regulate the traffic thereon should emerging circumstances render that necessary for the protection of the rights of the inhabitants. Paterson, &c. v. Magistrates of St Andrews, &c., July 27, 1881, H. L., p. 117.

Interdict—Enforcing interdict against buildings erected pendente lite—Equitable compensation for legal rights—Burgh—Administration of burgh property.

4. An inhabitant of a burgh was successful in interdicting the magistrates from erecting municipal stables on a piece of ground held by them for behoof of the inhabitants of the burgh as a bleaching-green and place of recreation. At the date when the process of interdict was commenced the magistrates had already entered into contracts for the buildings, and the works had been begun. Interim interdict was refused, and the stables were completed at an expense of £2000 before interdict was granted. In an action at the instance of the interdictor to have the buildings removed and the ground restored to its former state the magistrates offered to make over to the community a piece of ground near the ground in dispute and of double the size. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Adam) (1) that the Court had power to allow equitable compensation to be made in lieu of ordaining the removal of the buildings; and (2) that it was for the interest of the community that the offer of the magistrates should be accepted, and that the magistrates should be assoilzied on lodging in process a conveyance of the subjects in terms of their offer. Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, Jan. 19, 1881, p. 395.

BURGH—Continued.

See Road, 1—Prescription, 2—Police, 2.

CALCINING IRON. See Nuisance.

CAUTIONER. Caution—Stat. 1696, cap. 25—Stat. 19 and 20 Vict., cap. 60 (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856), sec. 6—Name of creditor in obligation omitted.

A and B signed an obligation to become sureties for an instalment of a composition on C D's bankrupt estate. Held that the obligation was not void by reason of the creditors in the obligation not being mentioned. Clapperton, Paton, & Co. v. Anderson, July 20, 1881, p. 1004.

CAUTION FOR EXPENSES. See Process, 10, 12.

CHARITY. See Police, 2.

CHARTER-PARTY. See Ship, 1, 2.

CHEQUE. See Bank.

CHURCH. Union of Parishes—Effect of Decree of Teind Commissioners in 1670 uniting "Kirks."

1. In 1455 Chanonry was erected into a burgh and united with the burgh of Rosemarkie, the two being called in combination the burgh of Fortrose. There was a church in each, the cathedral church of the diocese being in Chanonry, and the parish church in Rosemarkie.

In a proceeding by "the Bishop of Ross v. the Parishioners of Rosemarkie," the Commissioners of Teinds, after opposition, pronounced the following decree, dated 2d February 1670:—"The Lords unites the Kirks of Chanonrie and Rosemarkie, and appoints the minister of Rosemarkie and his successors to serve the cure at both kirks Sunday day about. The Lords, of consent of the Bp. of Rosse, declares the parishionairs of Rosemarkie frie of the support of the kirk of Chanonrie et e contra."

In an action seeking to enforce liability upon the heritors of Chanonry for repairs of the church, manse, and other ecclesiastical buildings of Rosemarkie, held that the meaning of the decree was that, while uniting the two kirks, the heritors of the two districts were to be separately liable each for the support of their own church, viz., the heritors of Chanonry for support of the cathedral church, and the heritors within Rosemarkie district for support of the parish church, and that looking to the decree and what followed upon it the heritors of Chanonry were exempt from assessment for the repairs to the church of Rosemarkie, although liable in so far as regarded the manse and other buildings. Magistrates of Fortrose, &c. v. MacIennan (Collector of Rosemarkie), Nov. 26, 1880, p. 124.

Stat. 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, sec. 8—Liability of heritors of quoad sacra parish.

2. Held by Lord Curriehill (Ordinary) that lands and heritages disjoined from a parish quoad sacra are not thereby freed from liability for the parochial burdens to which they were previously liable. Ibid.

Parish—Churchyard.

3. Held by Lord Adam, Ordinary, that certain heritors and parishioners were entitled by interdict to prevent another heritor from converting the family mausoleum in an old parish churchyard into an Episcopal chapel. Wright, &c. v. Lady Elphinstone, July 20, 1881, p. 1025.

CHURCH—Continued.

COLLATION. See Entail, 4.

COMMISSION. See Agent and Client, 4.

COMPENSATION. See Railway, 1.

COMPOSITION. See Superior and Vassal, 3, 5, 6.

COMPOSITION CONTRACT. See Cautioner.

CONFIDENTIALITY. See Proof.

CONTRACT. See Agreements and Contracts.

CONTRIBUTORY. See Public Company, 1, 2, 3, 5.

CONVERSION. See Succession, 8.

CRIME. See Justiciary Cases.

CUMULATIVE PROVISIONS. See Succession, 3, 4.

DAMAGES, CONSEQUENTIAL. See Horse, 1.

DAMAGES, LIQUIDATE. See Agreements and Contracts, 1.

DEAN OF GUILD COURT, JURISDICTION OF. See Burgh, 2.

DEBITUM FUNDI. See Superior and Vassal, 3.

DEPOSIT. Locatio operarum—Deposit of goods for hire without stipulation as to duration of contract.

Where goods are warehoused for hire without a stipulation as to the duration of the contract, the depositary is not entitled to insist upon their being removed at his pleasure without shewing reasonable cause therefor.

Circumstances in which it was held that no such reasonable cause had been shewn. Whyte v. Millar & Young, &c., Jan. 22, 1881, p. 432.

DESERTION. See Husband and Wife, 11, 12.

DILIGENCE. See Arrestment.

DILIGENCE, WRONGOUS USE OF. See Bill, 1, 2—Reparation, 3.

DOG. See Reparation, 6.

DOMICILE. See Husband and Wife, 12.

DOMICILE, FORUM OF PERSON WHO HAS NO. See Jurisdiction.

DONATION MORTIS CAUSA. See Succession, 3.

ELECTION. Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis to Lunatic—Power of election between legal and testamentary provisions.

Where a person is legally incapacitated from availing himself of a right of election between testamentary and legal provisions he does not lose the right, even though he receive temporary benefit for his maintenance and support out of the estate, and he may exercise it if the incapacity be removed, or, if it be not removed, the right may be exercised by his representatives after his death.

Circumstances which were held insufficient to justify a curator bonis for a lunatic in making such an election. Morison's Curator Bonis v. Morison's Trustees, Dec. 3, 1880, p. 205.

ELECTION (TO SUE). See Ship, 3.

ELECTION LAW. See separate Index of Registration Appeal Cases, p. 1092.

ENTAIL. Right of heir to cut timber.

1. A trust directed his estate to be entailed on A, his nephew, and certain other heirs, with this provision,—“And for the preservation of the growing timber and plantations on my said lands, I hereby direct my trustees to reserve the timber and plantations on my said estate when they convey the said lands to A, and the other heirs before mentioned: And it is hereby provided and conditioned that it shall not be lawful to A, or the whole heirs of entail, to cut down the growing timber or plantations, or any part thereof, without the consent and authority of my said trustees; and that my said trustees shall not be empowered to give such consent unless the growing timber or plantations on my said estate shall require such cutting down or thinning for their better preservation: Declaring also that the produce of all fallen trees, or cut timber, or bark, shall be applied in discharge of the various burdens charged on my said estate." By a deed of alteration and ratification, executed a year later, he made this provision,— "I declare that the principal sums of all debts, legacies, and provisions shall be charged and chargeable upon and affect only the fee of my said lands and estate of . . . and others, and that the rents thereof shall be chargeable with annual payments only; and I further declare that the free revenues of my said estates shall not be accumulated during the subsistence of this trust, nor applied in the payment of capital debts or provisions, but, on the contrary, shall be regularly paid over to my nephew, A, and the heirs of entail substituted to him, as the same shall arise,— that is, the rents and revenues of these estates, after deducting all public burdens, interest of debts, and provisions, jointures, annuities, and other annual charges." Held (rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) upon a construction of the two deeds that the heir in possession was not bound to apply the proceeds of sales of timber to the reduction of the capital debts of the estate.

ENTAIL—Continued.

Opinion (per Lord President) that he would have been so bound had the first deed not been altered by the second. Opinions (per Lord Deas and Lord Shand) that neither deed required him to do so. Huntly's Trustees v. Hallyburton's Trustees, Nov. 5, 1880, p. 50.

Heir in possession—Provisions to children, authority to charge fee and rents with, by bond and disposition in security—Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 21.

2. A deed of entail dated in 1799 conferred power upon the heirs of entail in possession to grant provisions to their younger children, not exceeding three years' free rents of the estates, provided that the bonds of provision should "contain this express condition, that the sums contained in the same shall not be exigible at once but shall be payable only by yearly instalments of ten per cent of the capital sum of such provisions, together with the interest due at the time." There was farther a declaration that the heirs in possession should pay regularly the instalments as they fell due, with interest, and should forfeit all right to the estate in the event of their allowing the instalments to fall three years in arrear, but there was no irritancy of the bonds.

In 1819 the heir of entail in possession granted a bond of provision in favour of his younger children for "a sum equal to three years' free rent of the said lands. . . ."

This provision became payable on the granter's death in 1876, and the succeeding heir of entail applied to the Court for power to charge the fee and rents of the estate with the amount by bond and disposition in security under the 21st section of the Rutherford Act.

Held that notwithstanding that the amount of the provisions was payable in ten yearly instalments the 21st section applied, and petition granted.

Case of Campbell, 26th January 1854, 16 D. 396, distinguished. Hope Johnstone v. Hope Johnstone, Nov. 27, 1880, p. 160.

Agreement between heir in possession and apparent heir—Heir and Executor.

3. An heir of entail in possession expended certain sums in improvements, and entered into an agreement with his son, the apparent heir, whereby the latter bound himself, "his heirs and successors, succeeding to" the estate, to repay the same. The son died without succeeding to the estate, but his eldest son succeeded his grandfather as heir of entail. Held that neither the grandson who succeeded to the estate, nor the personal representatives of the son, were bound by the agreement to repay the sum expended. Sinclair's Trustees v. Sinclair, &c., June 7, 1881, p. 749.

ENTAIL—Continued.

Succession—Collation—Heir aliquin successurus.

4. The heir of entail in possession of an estate by his settlement bequeathed a third of the residue of his free means to his son (who was then heir-apparent to the entailed estate), "partly in consideration of the burdens he will be subjected to on his succeeding me" in the entailed estate, "and to his heirs, executors, and successors." The son predeceased, leaving three children, the eldest of whom succeeded to the entailed estate on the death of his grandfather. In a question between him and the other two children as to whether he could take a share of the grandfather's bequest without collating his life interest in the entailed estate, held (diss. Lord Young) that there was here no room for the doctrine of collation, as the heir of entail was entitled to a share of the residue in consequence of the expressed will of the testator.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) on the case of Blair v. Blair, Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 97, 21 Scot. Jur. 612. Ibid.

Disentail—Provisions to children under Aberdeen Act where subjects disentailed and new entail executed.

5. An heir of entail, who in his marriage-contract had burdened the estate to the extent of three years' free rents as at the date of his death, with provisions to his younger children, obtained from them discharges therefor in their respective marriage-contracts in consideration of provisions therein made, amounting together to £90,000, which he secured on the estate. Subsequently he disentailed his estate, and executed a new entail embracing additional lands, but subject to debts which reduced the free rental below that of the original estate. In the deed he declared that the whole estates should be subject to the real burden of the provisions in his own contract of marriage in favour of his younger children. By his settlement he appointed two of the younger children to the surplus above £90,000.

In a question between the next heir of entail and the younger children, held (1) that though the younger children had granted discharges of the provisions in their father's contract of marriage their father had effectually released them therefrom; and (2) (in conformity with Irving v. Irving, 9 Macph. 539) that the provisions were to be measured by the free rental of the original estate as if it had not been disentailed at the date of their father's death. Duke of Roxburghe v. Russell, June 28, 1881, p. 862.

Foreign—Direction to entail jewels as heirlooms in England—Testamentary intention.

6. A trust-settlement in Scotch form, and executed in Scotland by a domiciled Scotch lady, directed that certain jewels, &c. should "be held as heirlooms and settled upon" her son, the Marquis of Bute, "and after him on the heirs entitled to succeed to the Bute estates in the county of Glamorgan;" and in the event of his dying without issue they were to be sold at his death by public auction, and the proceeds applied in the erection of almshouses, &c. The testatrix further directed that certain plate should "be settled and secured upon the same series of heirs as are appointed to succeed to the Marquis of Bute's Glamorganshire estates." The trustees delivered the jewels and plate to the Marquis on obtaining from him a receipt acknowledging that they had been delivered on the conditions set forth in the trust-deed, and binding himself to concur with the trustees in settling them by a formal deed, in such form as might be permitted by the rules of law and equity, in terms of the trust-deed.

In an action brought by the Marquis concluding for declarator that he was entitled to the property of the jewels and plate, it was admitted that by the law of England personal property might be effectually settled as heirlooms. Held that as the testator's wish might be effectually carried out by a settlement in English form, the Marquis had acquired no higher right than a life interest in the jewels and plate, and action dismissed.

ENTAIL—Continued.

Marquis of Bute v. Lady Bute's Trustees, &c., Dec. 3, 1880, p. 191.

See Bankruptcy, 7—Judicial Factor, 2.

ENGLISH ENTAIL OF SCOTCH ESTATE, EFFECT OF. See Succession, 10.

EXCISE. See Revenue, 7.

EXHIBITION. See Bankruptcy, 1—Process, 1.

EXPENSES. See Process, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16—Agent and Client, 4—Husband and Wife, 1, 8—Judicial Factor, 1.

FACULTY AND POWERS. Exercise of power of appointment.

A testator left the residue of his estate to trustees, with a declaration that upon the death of his son, or on the death of his son's wife if she survived him, the residue of the trust-funds should belong and be paid to the son's children "at such periods, and in such proportions, and under such limitations, conditions, and restrictions," as his son should direct by any deed under his hand.

The son, in a deed of appointment, after making provisions for his sons, directed his trustees to hold the remainder of the fund "upon trust, to pay the interest thereof" to his two daughters for their own separate use, notwithstanding coverture, and so that the daughters should not have power to dispose thereof by way of anticipation, and upon the death of each daughter to hold her share for her children in such shares as she should have appointed, and, failing children, for such persons as she should have appointed.

In a question, raised during the survivance of the son's widow, between the son's children and the father's trustees, who maintained that the appointments by the son were invalid, on the ground that he had restricted his daughters to mere liferents, and had not validly disposed of the fee of their shares, held that the appointment was valid, and had vested in the daughters the capital of their shares, but that these were limited to their separate use for life, independent of any present or future husband, and were to be held by them subject to the power of appointment conferred on them by their father's settlement, but without power to make any other assignment or appointment by way of alienation. Lennox's Trustees v. Lennox, &c., Oct. 16, 1880, p. 14.

FEE AND LIFERENT. See Succession, 11.

FERRY. See Property, 2.

FIXTURES AS BETWEEN LANDLORD AND TENANT. See Heritable and Moveable.

FOREIGN. See Husband and Wife, 12—Succession, 10—Agreements and Contracts, 2.

FORESHORE. See River, 2.

FORGERY. See Bill, 4.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY. Building Society—Effect of winding-up order on position of members—Right of member to pay up loan and withdraw under rules—Stat. 37 and 38 Vict., cap. 42 (Building Societies Act, 1874), sec. 14.

Held that a member of a building society, who under its rules was entitled to withdraw from it on payment of the balance of a loan due by him to the society, was not deprived of this right by the society having gone into voluntary liquidation at a time when it was due no debts except to its own members. Liquidators of the Scottish Savings and Investment Building Society v. Russell, July 7, 1881, p. 917.

GAME. See Justiciary Cases, 17, 18.

GAMING TRANSACTION. See Sponsio Ludicra.

GOLF. See Burgh, 3.

HARBOUR DUES. See Prescription, 2.

HEIR AND EXECUTOR. See Entail, 3.

HERITABLE AND MOVEABLE. Lease—Fixtures as between landlord and tenant.

A person occupied a cottage and piece of garden ground as yearly tenant for a period of ten years. His occupancy had commenced when the cottage was built and while the garden ground was rough and uncultivated. During his tenancy he planted ornamental shrubs, and laid out terraces with turf and gravel walks, access to the different terraces being got by sets of wooden steps. When removing from the subjects the tenant prepared to remove the shrubs, turf, wooden steps, and gravel on the walks. In an action at the instance of the landlord the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot) held that the tenant was not entitled to remove shrubs and turf, but allowed him to remove the wooden steps and the gravel from the walks. The landlord acquiesced in the Sheriff's judgment, but the tenant appealed to the Court of Session. The Court dismissed the appeal, Lord Gifford and Lord Young expressing strong opinions that the gravel on the walks was pars soli and not removeable. Burns v. Fleming, Dec. 7, 1880, p. 226.

See Succession, 2, 8.

HERITABLE SECURITY. See Succession, 2.

HORSE. Locatio Conductio—Riding horse hired for road galloped in grass field—Consequential damages.

1. A riding horse hired at the ordinary rate for a day's ride was ridden at a gallop in a grass field. While there it split its pastern bone, and six weeks after, when almost recovered, it died of inflammation caused by a twist in the bowels. In an action at the instance of the owner against the hirer for the value of the horse, held (diss. Lord Gifford) (1) that the galloping the horse in a grass field was a departure from the implied conditions of the contract, and that the accident must be held to have been caused by the fault of the defender; (2) that the death of the horse being presumably attributable to the want of exercise consequent upon the injury, the rider was liable in the value of the horse. Seton v. Paterson, Dec. 9, 1880, p. 236.

Sale—Detention by Seller—Personal bar.

2. A cab-owner purchased a mare from a horse-dealer, which he returned next day to the seller as having failed to answer the warranty alleged to have been granted with her. The seller wrote insisting on the fulfilment of the contract, but meanwhile kept the mare in his own stables, and worked her in his own business. Held that, by keeping and working the mare, the seller was barred from insisting in an action for implement of the contract and payment of the price. Croan v. Vallance, May 18, 1881, p. 700.

HOTEL. See Revenue, 6—Right in Security, 1.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Divorce—Aliment—Expenses.

1. A husband having obtained decree of divorce in the Outer-House, the wife presented a reclaiming note. On the wife's motion the Court gave her decree for aliment, to continue until final judgment on the reclaiming note, and for a sum to account of her expenses up to the close of the proof in the Outer-House. Montgomery v. Montgomery, Oct. 22, 1880, p. 26.

Wife—Affiliation and aliment of illegitimate child—Wife suing without husband's concurrence—Title to sue.

2. A married woman raised an action in the Sheriff Court against a man not her husband, alleging that she had been deserted by her husband, and that three years after her desertion she had given birth to a child of which the defender was the father, and concluding for payment of aliment. The Sheriff assoltized the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had failed to prove that he was the father of the child. The Court adhered.

Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young), that the pursuer had no title to sue. Wilkinson v. Bain, Nov. 9, 1880, p. 72.

Separation and Aliment—Habitual intoxication and reasonable fear of violence.

3. In an action of separation at the instance of a wife against her husband, held that to entitle the pursuer to decree of separation a mensa et thoro it was not necessary for her to instruct personal injury to herself, but that proof of the husband's habitual intoxication and violent conduct, inducing a reasonable fear of violence to the pursuer, was enough. M'Gaan v. M'Gaan, Dec. 14, 1880, p. 279.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Restriction of Aliment. See Process, 6.

Divorce—Condonation.

4. The wife of a sailor confessed to her husband that she had committed an act of adultery. After she made that statement the parties never lived together as man and wife, but the husband soon after went to sea, and during his absence wrote affectionate letters to his wife expressing his forgiveness of what had happened, signing himself "your loving husband." On his return home he discovered that his wife had committed adultery previous to the act which she had confessed. In an action of divorce raised by the husband, held that the letters, even if they amounted to condonation of the act of adultery which the wife had confessed, could not be pleaded in condonation of the previous act, of which the husband was ignorant when he wrote them. Ralston v. Ralston and Lord Advocate, Jan. 13, 1881, p. 371.

Condonation by letters.

5. Question, whether letters of forgiveness from a husband to a wife, without any subsequent cohabitation, will support a plea of condonation. Ibid.

Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 86), sec. 8—Appearance for Lord Advocate—Condonation.

6. Question, whether in an action of divorce it was competent for the Lord Advocate to insist in a plea of condonation which had been stated and subsequently withdrawn by the defender. Ibid.

Paternity of Child—Presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

7. In the case of a wife separated from her husband the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant may be overcome by direct or circumstantial evidence. Montgomery v. Montgomery, Jan. 21, 1881, p. 403.

Process—Expenses—Wife's expenses of Reclaiming Note refused.

8. Circumstances in which a wife reclaiming against a decree of divorce was refused the expenses of the reclaiming note. Ibid.

Divorce—Lenocinium—Bar.

9. Where a man, who had married a prostitute, some years after suggested to her that she should return to her former mode of life, and deserted her, held that he was barred by his conduct from insisting in an action of divorce for alleged adultery on her part. Marshall v. Marshall, May 20, 1881, p. 702.

Conjugal Rights Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 86), sec. 16—Reasonable provision to wife—Whether husband had obtained complete and lawful possession of the property.

10. A wife having received from her father a sum of money, was allowed by her husband to deposit it in bank in her own name, which she did for two years. She then, with her husband's knowledge and consent, uplifted it and invested £450 in heritable property, taking the title in favour of herself and her heirs and assignees. The rental of the property was about £30 per annum. The husband some years afterwards brought an action to set aside the conveyance in his wife's favour as a donation stante matrimonio and revocable. Held that the purchase having been made with funds of the wife, of which, though they undoubtedly fell under his jus mariti, the husband had never "obtained complete and lawful possession" in the sense of the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, he was bound in terms of that enactment before claiming the property to make a reasonable provision therefrom for his wife, and that in the circumstances the conveyance in question, which did not exclude his jus mariti from the rents during his life, but only secured the property to his wife after the dissolution of the marriage, was no more than a reasonable and moderate provision, and could not be revoked.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

Observed (per Lord President) that "complete and lawful possession," in the sense of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, sec. 16, means something more than a good title to possess, and implies not control merely but actual possession. Clark v. Clark, May 25, 1881, p. 723.

Divorce—Desertion—Pursuer unwilling to adhere.

11. In an action by a wife against her husband, concluding for divorce on the ground of desertion, the pursuer deposed that her husband had deserted her in May 1870, and had failed to contribute to her support since that date; that prior to the desertion he had treated her with great cruelty, and that if he had asked her to go back in July 1870 she would have been afraid to go back, and that she was not now willing to adhere. The Lord Ordinary (Adam) found that as the pursuer had, on account of her husband's cruelty, been, during the whole period of desertion, unwilling to resume cohabitation, she was not entitled to the remedy of divorce for desertion.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Adam) that as the defender had deserted the pursuer for upwards of four years, and as there was no proof of his having made such an offer of adherence as she was bound to accept, she was entitled to decree of divorce. Winchcombe v. Winchcombe, May 26, 1881, p. 726.

Divorce for desertion—Foreign—Jurisdiction—Domicile.

12. A Canadian married a Canadian wife in Canada. The wife deserted her husband there in 1873, and subsequently refused to adhere. The husband came to Scotland in 1879, and in 1880 raised an action of divorce on the ground of wilful and malicious desertion, averring that he was now domiciled in Scotland. In proof of this averment he deposed that he had abandoned Canada as his home, and had come to reside with his children in Edinburgh; that he had bought a business there, and that his present intention was to remain in Scotland as his home; that one main reason of his leaving Canada was his desire to obtain a divorce, which he could not get by the law of Canada. The action was undefended. Held (1) that the pursuer had proved a domicile in Scotland; and therefore (2) that the husband's domicile was that of his wife; and therefore (3) that the Court had jurisdiction to pronounce decree of divorce. Carswell v. Carswell, July 6, 1881, p. 901.

HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT. See Revenue, 6.

INCOME-TAX. See Revenue, 4, 8.

INHABITED HOUSE-DUTY. See Revenue, 1, 6.

INSURANCE, MARINE. Construction—Total loss—Notice of abandonment—Date of action—From which does liability of underwriters date.

The "Krishna" was stranded on the west coast of India on 23d May 1879, about a fortnight before the usual commencement of the south-west monsoon. Every possible effort was made by the captain and crew before the breaking of the monsoon to get her off, but without success. The south-west monsoon usually prevails from June till October, and during its continuance any farther effort to relieve the vessel was admittedly impracticable. The owner being advised that the vessel would break up during the monsoon, gave notice, on 7th June 1879, of abandonment, as for a constructive total loss, to the underwriters, with whom she was insured, for full value. This notice they refused to accept. The owner raised an action on the policy on 1st October 1879. The underwriters having subsequently succeeded in salving the vessel, pleaded in defence that there was no constructive total loss either at the date when notice was given, or when the action was raised; and alternatively that in determining the question of constructive total loss the point of time to be looked to was the raising of the action, at which date there was no constructive total loss, whatever view might be taken of the state of matters at the date when notice of abandonment was given.

INSURANCE, MARINE—Continued.

Held (1) that though the total loss of the "Krishna" might, at 7th June 1879, be probable, still, in the circumstances, and looking to the possibilities, a prudent uninsured owner would not at that date have dealt with her as a total loss, but would have waited, and that therefore the notice of abandonment given was premature; (2) that still less was there a constructive total loss at the date of raising the action; and (3) that the underwriters had not, by sending out to salve the ship, by implication accepted the notice of abandonment.

Question whether the date of notice of abandonment or of raising action is the point of time at which the question of constructive total loss is to be determined, and the rights and liabilities of parties hinc inde fixed. Shepherd v. Henderson, Feb. 25, 1881, p. 518.

INTERDICT. Publication—Private Correspondence.

It is a question of circumstances whether the Court will grant an interdict against the publication of private letters by the receiver.

A person having informed certain of his wife's relations that he intended to publish for circulation among his friends a private correspondence between himself and his wife and them, they presented a petition for interdict against the publication. The Court, after examining the letters, refused to grant interdict.

Observed (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that if, by the publication of the correspondence any injury was done, the mere fact that interdict had been refused in the present action would not shield the person publishing it from the consequences of his act. White, &c. v. Dickson, &c., July 5, 1881, p. 896.

See Burgh, 4—Property, 2.

ISSUES. See Process, 2—Reparation, 2, 4—Bill, 3.

JOINT ADVENTURE. See Partnership, 1.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Costs of unsuccessful litigation, liability for.

1. Held that the expenses in which a judicial factor was found liable to his opponent in a litigation properly entered upon and conducted by him, though unsuccessful in its result, were proper charges of administration, for which he was entitled to take credit, even though they exhausted the estate, before paying a creditor of the factory estate. Drummond (Carse's Factor) v. Carse's Executors, Jan. 27, 1881, p. 449.

Special Powers—Unworkable Trust—Exhumation of dead body.

2. By his trust-disposition and settlement the late William Tennant, of Eatonville, Ayr, directed his trustees to erect upon the place of his interment in the New Cemetery at Ayr a mausoleum, which was to cost £500. After his decease he was interred in the said cemetery in a plot of ground belonging to a deceased relative, whose representatives refused to permit the erection of a mausoleum upon it. On a petition by the judicial factor who had been appointed to execute the trust, authority was granted by Lord Fraser to exhume the body and re-inter it in another part of the said cemetery at the sight of the Sheriff-substitute at Ayr, and to erect a mausoleum upon the place of re-interment. Kilpatrick (Tennant's Factor), March 10, 1881, p. 592.

Tutor-dative, appointment of while ward's father still alive.

3. Petition by a father to have a tutor-dative appointed to his lunatic son, on the ground that the petitioner was incapacitated by age from continuing to act as tutor-at-law, granted. Graham and Spouse (Petitioners), July 19, 1881, p. 996.

See Railway, 4—Arrestment, 3—Election.

JURISDICTION. Forum of person who has no domicile.

A travelling merchant informed a person in Scarborough, from whom he ordered goods, that he had no fixed residence, but travelled, in pursuance of his business, all over the United Kingdom. The goods were delivered, some in England, some in Scotland. The purchaser having failed to pay the purchase-money, the seller brought an action against him in Scotland, where he happened to be on business. He had not been forty days in Scotland when the summons was served. Held that, in the circumstances, the Scotch Courts had jurisdiction, the defender's forum being wherever he might chance to be for the time. Linn v. Casadino, June 24, 1881, p. 849.

JURISDICTION—Continued.

See Husband and Wife, 12.

JURY TRIAL. See Process, 8, 9.

JUS QUESITUM TERTIO. See Property, 6.

JUDICIARY CASES.

Crime.

Indictment, irrelevant—Refusal of leave to desert diet pro loco et tempore—Dismissal of panel from bar—Reindictment for same offence—Competency.

1. Where a libel was found irrelevant, and the Court refused a motion by the advocate-depute to desert the diet pro loco et tempore, and dismissed the panel from the bar, held that the prosecutor was not barred from raising a new libel for the same offence.

Observed that when the diet is deserted simpliciter on the motion of the prosecutor, he is barred from further proceedings for the same offence. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Hall, June 17, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 52.

Jurisdiction—Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Locus delicti.

2. Held that a domiciled Englishman, resident in England, who had been lawfully apprehended in England and brought to Scotland for trial on a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, by sending letters from England to traders in Scotland, containing false statements and representations, whereby he had fraudulently induced them to forward goods to him in England without payment and without intending to pay for the same, was subject to the jurisdiction of the criminal Courts in Scotland as the forum delicti. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Witherington, June 17, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 41.

Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Fraudulently ordering and obtaining goods on false pretences.

3. The minor proposition in an indictment under which J W was charged with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, set forth that the panel, in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme of obtaining, on false pretences, the property of other persons, and applying the same to his own uses and purposes without paying or intending to pay therefor, did wickedly and feloniously, and falsely and fraudulently, write a letter with the false and fraudulent printed heading, "J W, commission salesman, Blackburn," and "did enclose therein a bank cheque or order for the sum of £25," bearing to be signed by him, meaning "by the style, terms, and tenor of the said letter, and by the said cheque or order," to represent to A B that he intended to become a bona fide purchaser of goods, and that he was "a person of good credit that the said bank cheque or order was equivalent to a ready-money payment, and that the same would be honoured on its being presented for payment at the office in M of the said," and this he did, well knowing that he had "no adequate funds in the said bank to meet the said cheque, and that the same would not be honoured." That the said A B, being deceived by his said false and fraudulent representations, sent certain goods which the panel appropriated, and for which he had not paid, and did not intend to pay. Held that the facts set forth in the minor proposition were relevant to support the charge in the major. Ibid.

Conviction—Alternative complaint—General conviction.

4. Held (following Boyd v. M'Jannet, May 21, 1879, ante, vol. vi. Just. Cases, 43, overruling Scott v. Morrison, April 9, 1872, 2 Coup. 218), that a general conviction of the offence charged following on an alternative complaint is incompetent. Charleson v. Duffie, June 10, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 34.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition—Relevancy—Ordering goods without intending to pay therefor.

5. The minor proposition of an indictment, under which a panel was charged with falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, set forth that the panel "having formed a fraudulent and felonious scheme for the purpose of obtaining the goods of others on false pretences, and applying the same" to his "own uses and purposes, without paying or intending to pay therefor," ordered goods by letters, in which he did "represent and pretend" to the owners of the goods, and induce them "to believe that" he "intended to become a bona fide purchaser" of "these goods," and would pay the price thereof weekly . . . or on delivery, or on demand of payment, or shortly thereafter, and the said "goods" were fraudulently received and appropriated by him to his own uses and purposes, and that he had not paid and did not intend to pay therefor. Held that the facts set forth in the minor did not relevantly support the charge in the major, that the statement that the accused falsely represented that he intended to become a bona fide purchaser, and to pay the price, was not a relevant averment of false pretences, it being necessary to set forth a false statement relating to a past or present fact.

Question, whether a domiciled Englishman, resident in England, who addresses letters to persons in Scotland containing false and fraudulent statements, is subject to the jurisdiction of the criminal Courts in Scotland. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Hall, March 25, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 28.

Perjury—Competency of trying two or more panels on the same indictment—Relevancy—Separation of trials—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Administration of justice.

6. In a suspension of a conviction for perjury before a Sheriff and jury, held (1) that it was competent to charge two or more panels on the same indictment with perjury, provided the alleged perjury related to the same matter, and was committed to compass the same defeat of justice; (2) that a motion for separation of trials must be supported by special grounds other than that the charge was one of perjury; (3) that where an indictment charged, in the major proposition, conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice by means of perjury, as also perjury, it was not necessary, where the facts inferring perjury were sufficiently set forth in connection with the conspiracy, that the minor should set forth a separate species facti applicable to the charge of perjury apart from conspiracy; (4) that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to try a charge of perjury though he could not pronounce the declaration of infamy which was generally in use to be included in the sentence of the High Court by virtue of the Act 1555, c. 47; and (5) that a Sheriff-substitute appointed ad interim during the pleasure of the Sheriff was not bound to produce evidence of his authority.

Question, whether the declaration of infamy, generally included in the sentences for perjury, of the High Court, should not now be discontinued in the majority of cases. Marr, &c. v. Procurator-Fiscal of Midlothian, Feb. 4, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 21.

Indictment—Competency of striking out words from an indictment.

7. Held that the Court has power at a pleading diet to allow words to be struck out of an indictment if the alteration does not vary the crime with which the panel is charged. Her Majesty's Advocate v. M'Intosh, Feb. 1, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 13.

Relevancy—Bad treatment of child—Leaving child in charge of young girl.

8. A panel was charged with "culpable and wilful neglect and bad treatment of a child of tender age, by a person who has the custody and keeping of it, whereby such child is injured in its health." The minor proposition set forth that the panel "did culpably and wilfully neglect to supply the said child with wholesome and sufficient food and clothing, and did feed her with improper and deleterious food." Objection of want of specification, on the ground that administering deleterious substances was charged, and that the panel was entitled to be told what those substances were, repelled, but the words, "and did feed her with improper and deleterious food," allowed to be deleted as superfluous, on the motion of the public prosecutor. Her Majesty's Advocate v. M'Intosh, Feb. 1, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 13.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Error in date of minute recording sentence and in warrant of imprisonment.

9. A person was tried before a Sheriff and sentenced to imprisonment on 24th November 1880. The minute of the Court in which the sentence was recorded was by mistake dated 23d November 1880, and the warrant of imprisonment which followed thereon bore the same date. The Court (diss. Lord Young) suspended the sentence. Riddell v. Stevenson, &c., Feb. 3, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 17.

Appeal.

Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), sec. 3, sub-sec. 5—Appeal—Notice—Posting of notice on last day for giving notice.

10. Sub-section 5 of section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, provides that an appellant shall, "within three days" of receiving the appeal case from the inferior Judge, "give notice of appeal in writing to the respondent." An appellant posted the statutory notice on the third day, but the respondent did not receive it until the morning of the fourth. Held that this was sufficient compliance with the statute. Charleson v. Duffes, June 10, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 34.

Prosecution under particular Statutes—Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act.

Statute 13 and 14 Vict., c. 92, sec. 1, Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850—Wanton cruelty—Shooting at a dog trespassing and disturbing game in a field.

11. A dog trespassing in a field chased a rabbit therein. A coachman in the employment of the proprietor of the field followed the dog, and, when within five yards, shot at and hit it, the gun being loaded with No. 4 or 5 shot. The dog ultimately recovered, but suffered much pain for a considerable time. The coachman was convicted on a charge of "wanton cruelty" under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act, 1850.

On appeal, the Court quashed the conviction. Jack v. Campbell, Oct. 29, 1880, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Food and Drugs Act.

Statute—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 6, sub-sec. 4—Buttermilk—Extraneous matter necessary in preparation of article.

12. Sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, sets forth that "no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food . . . which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section (4) where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation."

A person was convicted of an offence under the said section for selling buttermilk containing "30 per cent of added water." In a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary the Sheriff stated this question of law:—"Seeing that water is invariably used in churning, and is necessary for the preparation of buttermilk, whether the case does not fall under exception 4 to clause 6 of the said Act." The Court quashed the conviction, on the ground that, inasmuch as the libel did not set forth that there was any recognised standard of purity in buttermilk, the case fell under the exception of sub-sec. 4. (Lord Young, while concurring in the above judgment, preferred to rest his judgment on the ground that the facts did not amount to a contravention of the 6th section of the statute, inasmuch as the water was not proved to have been added with the intention of cheating the public, or to the prejudice of the purchaser.)

Question (per Lord Justice-Clerk) whether sub-sec. 4 did not exclude the possibility of a conviction in respect of the sale of any articles in which extraneous matter was necessarily mixed in the course of preparation or collection, however great the proportion of that extraneous matter might be. Warnock v. Johnstone, July 15, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 55.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 63), sec. 6—Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), sec. 2—Cream—Inferior quality at inferior price.

13. A milk dealer, was convicted, under sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, for selling, "to the prejudice of the purchaser, 4d. worth of cream, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded." It was proved that the purchaser had asked for a certain quantity of cream from a servant of the dealer, and was served with cream at 1d. per gill, which, on analysis, was found to be diluted with 34 per cent of skimmed milk. Further, that the dealer had also for sale a superior quality of cream, containing a smaller percentage of skimmed milk, which he sold at a higher price. The magistrate found that the cream at 1d. per gill was not of the quality of cream. On appeal, the Court held that the sale of the inferior, though pure, quality of cream at a low price was not an offence within the meaning of the statute. Morton v. Green, June 10, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 36.

Police Acts.

Obstruction—Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 251.

14. The above section enacts—"Every person who in any street or private street, to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents or passengers, commits any of the following offences, shall, on conviction," be liable to certain penalties—"Every person who, by means of any cart, carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, or any animal or other means, wilfully interrupts any public crossing, or wilfully causes any obstruction in any public footpath or other public thoroughfare. . . Every person who shall jostle or annoy any person passing thereon."

A complaint set forth that three men were guilty of a contravention of the Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 251, in so far as they did, on the High Street of Kirkcaldy, "to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers, wilfully cause an obstruction in the public footpath of said street, by means of congregating."

In a suspension of a conviction obtained on this complaint, held that the complaint did not set forth any offence under the section libelled, and that the conviction being outwith the statute was not protected by the finality clauses from suspension, and conviction quashed.

Opinion, per Lord Justice-Clerk, that the conviction was valid. Wemyss v. Black, March 19, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 25.

Suspension—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict., cap. 273), sections 131, 132—Relevancy—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., cap. 112), sec. 12—Libel.

15. The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 12, enacts that "where any person is convicted of an assault on any constable when in the execution of his duty such person shall be guilty of an offence under this Act."

In the Police Court of Glasgow the relevancy of a complaint charging an offence under section 12 was objected to, on the ground that it did not set forth knowledge on the part of the accused that the persons assaulted were constables in discharge of their duty. The magistrate repelled the objection, and the accused was convicted and sentenced.

In a suspension brought on the ground that no offence under the statute had been relevantly charged, and that the conviction and sentence being outwith the statute might be set aside by the High Court, held (1) that the complaint set forth a good charge in substance, and that the magistrate had jurisdiction to decide on the question of relevancy; and therefore (2) that the jurisdiction of the High Court was excluded by sections 131 and 132 of the statute.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Opinions, that the objection to the relevancy of the complaint had been rightly repelled. O'Brien v. M'Phee, Oct. 30, 1880, Just. Cases, p. 8.

Public House Act.

Public-house—Public-house Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35)—Breach of certificate—"Notoriously bad fame"—Assembling and meeting.

16. Circumstances which held not sufficient to support a charge against a public-house keeper of "allowing women of notoriously bad fame to assemble or meet together in his house."

Opinion (per Lord Young) that to support a charge of allowing men or women of notoriously bad fame to assemble or meet in a public-house it is necessary to prove that the assembling or meeting had reference to the bad character referred to.

Opinions contra (per Lord Craighill and Lord Adam). Kirton v. Cadenhead, Oct. 30, 1880, Just. Cases, p. 4.

Poaching Acts.

Process—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68—Summary Procedure Act, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53, schedule B—Complainer appearing by procurator—Complaint signed by procurator.

17. In an appeal (which was unopposed) against a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute (Cowan) at Greenock, dismissing a complaint under the Day Trespass Act, presented in terms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the Court, after hearing counsel, held (1) that the complaint was sufficiently signed by a duly authorised law-agent as procurator for the complainer; and (2) that the complainer might be represented by a law-agent at the trial. Shaw Stewart v. Wilson, June 10, 1881, Just. Cases, p. 33.

Trespass—Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68, sec. 1—Farm servant—Killing hare taken from snare—Permission to snare rabbits.

18. A tenant had power under his lease to snare rabbits, and employed A, one of his farm-servants, to set and attend to his snares. A entered a field on the farm, and took a hare, apparently dead, out of a rabbit-snare. The hare recovered, and ran away. A set his dog after it, and killed it when the dog had retrieved it. A was charged with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act by entering or being in a hay field in search of or in pursuit of game. The Sheriff assoltized the accused. On appeal, the Court (dis. Lord Adam) affirmed the Sheriff's judgment. Lawrie, &c. v. M'Arthur, Oct. 29, 1880, Just. Cases, p. 2.

LEASE. Agreements and Contracts—Construction and Effect.

1. By agreement, supplementary to their lease, the tenants of certain quarries agreed to construct a tramway from the quarries "by the end of the policy of Thurso Castle to their works at Thurso East," and "to compensate the tenants along the line for any damage done to their farms." The landlord, who was proprietor of Thurso Castle, agreed "to give gratuitously the land required for the tramway."

From the southmost corner, and along the west wall of the policy, there ran a private occupation road belonging to the landlord, between the policy wall and the foreshore of the estuary of Thurso river, leading from the public road to the tenants' works, and thence to the offices of Thurso Castle. By this road the tenants had been accustomed to cart their material from the quarries to their works, and on it there was room to lay a tramway without interfering with other traffic. It was the only practicable route outside the policy. But before reaching the tenants' works it passed through the works of another quarry company, who, it was alleged by the tenants, would object to the construction of the tramway through their yard.

In a question between the landlord and tenants, the latter claiming right to make their tramway through the policy of the former, held (rev. judgment of First Division) that the meaning of the agreement between the parties was that the tramway should be constructed outside the policy wall, and that the landlord was not bound to give the tenants any right to the ground required, except such rights as belonged to him, but must give them the use of his name in any proceedings necessary to vindicate their rights. Sinclair v. Caithness Flagstone Quarrying Co., April 7, 1881, H. L., p. 78.

LEASE—Continued.

Verbal alteration—Proof—Acquiescence—Rei intervenus.

2. In an action by a landlord for payment of £1500 as the half year's rent of a coalfield, under a written lease, of which upwards of twenty years were still to run (with certain breaks in favour of the tenant), the tenant alleged that with the view of enabling him to resist demands of workmen for an increase of wages, the landlord, who had the option of a royalty or a fixed rent, had verbally agreed to reduce the fixed rent by one-third, and that on the faith of this agreement he (the tenant) had resisted the demands of the workmen and shut up the colliery for two months. Held (diss. Lord Shand, rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that as the tenant had merely averred a verbal agreement to alter the rent from £3000 to £2000, unsupported by any facts which necessarily implied acquiescence on the part of the landlord in an alteration of the lease, he was not entitled to probation.

Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company, H. of L., 3 Macq. 467, and Sutherland v. Montrose Shipbuilding Company, Feb. 3, 1860, 22 D. 665, commented upon. Kirkpatrick v. Allanshaw Coal Co., Dec. 17, 1880, p. 327.

House becoming uninhabitable—Right of tenant to leave—Rent where tenant's occupation interrupted for long period.

3. The tenant of a house, the lease of which expired at Whitsunday, removed from the house in the end of February preceding, in consequence of dangerous defects in the drainage. The landlord had the drains put in order, but the operation took two months. In an action by the landlord for the half year's rent, held that the failure of the landlord for so considerable a period to supply a habitable house disentitled him to recover any part of the half year's rent. Scottish Heritable Security Co. (Limited) v. Granger, Jan. 28, 1881, p. 459.

Circumstances entitling tenant to resile from agreement to prolong lease.

4. On 6th February 1880 the tenant in possession of a dwelling-house agreed, by letter, to take the house for two years from Whitsunday following, when his lease expired. In the end of February he removed his family and furniture from the house, on account of its being uninhabitable by reason of defects in the drains.

Opinion, per cur., that, although the defects in the drains had been remedied by 20th April, the tenant was not bound to resume possession, and was entitled to resile from his agreement to prolong the lease. Ibid.

Mineral—Lease to terminate if minerals became "not worth expense of working"—Fall in market price of mineral.

5. In a lease of gas coal for twenty-nine years from Whitsunday 1867 it was provided that if at any time during the subsistence of the lease it should be "judicially found, upon a report by arbiters, that the gas coal, from no fault, neglect, or irregularity on the part of the lessees, has become not worth the expense of working, this lease shall come to an end at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after it shall be so found." In 1880 the lessees obtained a report from the arbiters setting forth that, from no fault on the part of the lessees, the mineral had become not worth the expense of working, the arbiters stating that the grounds on which they had arrived at this conclusion had reference "solely to the state of the market for gas coal at the time." In an action subsequently raised by the lessees, concluding for declarator that the gas coal, from no fault of the pursuers, "has become not worth the expense of working, and that said lease shall come to an end at Martinmas 1880, held (1) that the clause in question was to be construed as applicable, inter alia, to the case of the mineral becoming not worth the expense of working in consequence of a continued depression of market prices, although the produce of the mines had not deteriorated in quantity or quality; (2) that the report by the arbiters was to be regarded as proceeding on a due consideration of the existing state and future prospects of the market for gas coal; and therefore (3) that the lessees were entitled to bring the lease to an end. Shotts Iron Co. v. Deas, Feb. 25, 1881, p. 530.

LEASE—Continued.

Constitution and proof of lease—Implied acceptance of written lease—Rei interventus—Agent and Principal.

6. A subtenant of a farm, prior to the expiry of the principal lease at Martinmas 1876, entered into negotiations with the Edinburgh agent of the landlord (who resided in England) for a nineteen years' lease, at an increased rent. A lease was adjusted, and, after being signed by the tenant, was sent, in August 1877, by the Edinburgh agent to the London agents of the landlord for his signature. The lease was retained by them till August 1878, the tenant, in the meantime, having been in possession of the farm, and having made a payment to account of the increased rent.

In August 1878 the landlord repudiated the lease, and raised an action of removal against the tenant.

Held that, in the circumstances, implied acceptance of the lease on the part of the landlord had been instructed.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) that the landlord's retention of the lease, signed by the tenant, was in itself sufficient to infer acceptance on his part.

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that rei interventus was necessary to bind the landlord. Ballantine, &c. v. Stevenson, July 15, 1881, p. 959.

See Trust, 2—Bankruptcy, 10—Heritable and Moveable.

LIEN. See Retention, 1, 2—Bankruptcy, 6.

LOCATIO CONDUCTIO. See Horse, 1.

LUNATIC. See Poor, 4—Election—Judicial Factor, 3.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Yearly engagement—Tacit relocation—Special agreement.

Held that the rule of tacit relocation did not apply to an engagement of a workman for one year. Lennox v. Allan & Son, Oct. 26, 1880, p. 38.

MINERALS. See Lease, 2, 5—Nuisance.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Tutors and Curators—Authority to accept reconveyance of feu where feuar unable to pay feu-duty.

In circumstances creating a case of high expediency amounting in law to necessity the Court authorised tutors-nominate to accept a reconveyance of subjects which had been feued out by the father of the ward. Campbell, Feb. 26, 1881, p. 543.

MONTHS, CALENDAR OR LUNAR. See Succession, 1.

MORA. See River, 1—Personal Bar.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Burgh, 4—Minor and Pupil.

NOTARY PUBLIC. See Agent and Client, 1.

NUISANCE. Property—Calcining Ironstone.

A mining company leased the minerals on an estate subject to the condition that they should not conduct any operations within two miles of the mansion-house. They thereafter commenced calcining ironstone raised from this estate in bings at places beyond this radius, and near their march. The proprietor of the adjoining estate raised an action concluding for interdict against the company, on the ground that the smoke from their bings was destroying the trees in his plantations. Held, after a proof, (1) that the pursuer had proved that his plantations had been injured by the defenders' operations; and (2) that he was entitled to interdict to prevent the defenders calcining within one mile of his march.

(Diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that further evidence should have been taken as to whether the places for the calcining bings had not been conveniently and reasonably chosen, having regard to the interests of the company as well as of the neighbouring proprietors.) Inglis v. Shotts Iron Co., July 20, 1881, p. 1006.

NUISANCE—Continued.

See Process, 2—Property, 3.

PARENT AND CHILD. Filiation—Period of gestation.

1. Where in an action of filiation intercourse was proved to have taken place at an unascertained date between 287 and 314 days prior to the birth of the pursuer's child, held that the fact that the pursuer herself deponed to a date which gave the lengthened period of gestation of 305 days was not enough to overcome her testimony that the child which was born was the fruit of the intercourse which had then taken place. Cook v. Rattray, Dec. 4, 1880, p. 217.

Access to child by mother living separate from husband.

2. A lady who had left her husband presented a petition to the Court praying their Lordships to regulate the terms on which she was to have access to her only child, two years of age, who remained with its father. Petition dismissed, on the ground that the lady had left her husband without any good or sufficient reason in law. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, March 5, 1881, p. 574.

PARTNERSHIP. Joint adventure—Rights of co-adventurers where copartnership trade extended on its natural line.

1. One of three parties to a co-adventure in the purchase and working of a river steamer upon the Clyde purchased three years afterwards, upon the credit of the co-adventure, a second steamer for the same trade. Eleven years later, the position and relations of the co-adventurers having somewhat changed, a third steamer was bought by the same party, the price being paid by aid of a security over the first. In an action of accounting and payment by one of his co-adventurers against the purchaser the Court, in these and the other circumstances of the case, held that the presumption that the second steamer was partnership property had not been rebutted, but that as regarded the third there was no sufficient proof of joint ownership or partnership. Davie v. Buchanan, Dec. 17, 1880, p. 319.

Obligation on expiry of Partnership to renew, but without a term, whether enforceable—Agreements and Contracts.

2. Three medical practitioners, in 1869, entered into a contract of partnership for a period of ten years, and thereafter so long as they should agree, but subject to any of the partners being entitled to put an end to it at the 30th April 1879, or at the 30th April in any year thereafter, on notice given. The two senior partners bound themselves by a supplementary agreement, also entered into in 1869, "that on the termination of the fixed period of copartnership provided by the said contract . . . neither of them shall enter into any new arrangements connected with the carrying on of their profession and business in A without the concurrence and consent of the other, and unless otherwise agreed, each of the said parties hereto shall then be entitled to retain an equal interest . . . in the present business, subject to deduction," &c.

Held that the supplementary agreement was not binding on the parties to it, for want of a definite and certain term. Traill v. Dewar, March 8, 1881, p. 583.

Latent assignation by one partner of his beneficial interest to a copartner.

3. A contract of copartnership provided that it should not be in the power of any of the partners "to assign all or any part of his share or interests in the capital, stock, or profits of the concern, to any person or persons, or to give them a right to inspect the company's books, or to interfere in any way with the business of the company," and that should any such assignation be granted contrary to this stipulation, the same should be null and void "so far as regards the company or other individual partners, who shall not be obliged to pay any attention thereto." It was also provided that on the death, insolvency, or retirement of any partner, the remaining partners should have the option of buying his interest at the amount standing at his credit at the last balance. The company having come to consist of three partners, R, S, and C, with equal shares, R and S entered into an agreement, which was not disclosed to C, by which R sold to S, his nephew, his whole interest in the concern as it stood at a certain date. R continued ostensibly a partner till his death, which occurred about seven years after the date of this agreement, during which period the business and prosperity of the company greatly increased. On the death of R, when the agreement between him and S came to light, C raised an action against S to compel him to communicate the benefit which he had obtained by his latent arrangement with R.

PARTNERSHIP—Continued.

Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) (1) that the contract of copartnery did not prohibit a sale of the beneficial interest of one of the partners either to a stranger or a copartner, provided the effect of the sale did not oblige the company or other partners to take cognisance of it; (2) that the rule which requires a partner, dealing with an asset or liability of the company, or transacting in the line of the company's business, to communicate any benefit derived by him to the company, did not apply to a partner purchasing another partner's interest in the company. Cassels v. Stewart, Jan. 13, 1881, H. L., p. 1.

PENALTY. See Agreements and Contracts, 1.

PERSONAL BAR. Acceptance of Composition—Mora.

Held that a creditor who had refused to accept a composition on his debt, but had neglected for ten months to return to his debtor a bill for the amount of the composition which was subsequently sent to him, was not barred thereby from insisting in an action for the payment of the whole amount of his debt. Thew & Co. v. Sinclair & Co., Feb. 1, 1881, p. 467.

See Bill, 4—Husband and Wife, 9—Horse, 2.

PLEDGE. See Bankruptcy, 6.

POINDING. Illegal execution—Appraisement—Liability of creditor.

A sheriff-officer, in carrying through a poinding under a small-debt decree, poinded almost the whole articles in the debtor's house, and, in the report of the valuation and sale, articles of household furniture, pictures, and portfolios full of engravings were united under one head and valued together. No serious attempt had been made to arrive at the real value, and the whole were valued at the amount of the decree, and expenses. The two appraisers who assisted were not put on oath. No bidders having appeared at the sale, the articles were declared to belong to the poinding creditor at the appraised value, and were removed by him to an auction sale-room for sale. Before they were sold the debtor intimated that the proceedings were illegal, and that he held both the poinding creditor and the sheriff-officer answerable. In an action of reduction and damages, held that the poinding and sale had been illegally carried through, and that the poinding creditor having sold the goods after receiving notice of the illegality, must be held to have adopted the proceedings of the officer, and was liable in damages along with him.

Question, Is the employer of a sheriff-officer liable in damages for his illegal acts?

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that appraisers in poindings must be put on oath. Le Conte v. Douglas and Richardson, Dec. 1, 1880, p. 175.

POINDING OF THE GROUND. Effect of service of Summons.

1. The service of a summons of poinding of the ground has the effect of putting a nexus on the moveables which are on the subjects at the date of service, and interpellates the heritable proprietor from allowing others to acquire rights over them.

Held that an auctioneer who had, under the instructions of the heritable proprietor of certain subjects, removed moveables which had been on the subjects when a summons of poinding of the ground was served, and who had afterwards sold these moveables by auction, notwithstanding service of a note of suspension and interdict, was not entitled to deduct from the price received therefor either advances made to his employer or his commission. Lyons v. Anderson, &c., Oct. 21, 1880, p. 24.

POINDING OF THE GROUND—Continued.

Security for current interest.

2. Poinding of the ground in security for interest current but not yet due is competent, but payment cannot be demanded till the stipulated term arrives.

A petition in a Sheriff Court craved warrant of poinding of the ground for payment of a principal sum of £2000 (which had been constituted a real burden over certain lands bearing interest, but the payment of principal being deferred until the occurrence of an event which had not yet taken place), and of the interest current but not due till the term of Whitsunday next following the date of the petition. The trustee in the debtor's sequestration appeared. Warrant was granted in terms of the prayer, "with this variation, that instead of making payment as craved, the officer who carries out the warrants shall consign the free proceeds with the Clerk of Court to abide the orders of Court." A sale followed, and the proceeds were consigned as ordered. When the first term for payment of interest arrived warrant was granted for payment out of the consigned fund. Like warrants were granted on two subsequent occasions when interest became due. Held that the poinding in security for the interest was competent, and that the irregularity in that part of the prayer of the petition which craved warrant of poinding for the principal sum had been cured by the mode of proceeding subsequently adopted by the Sheriff. Stewart v. Ritchie (Gibson's Trustee), Dec. 10, 1880, p. 270.

POLICE. Assessment—Short tenancy—Stat. 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 (General Police and Improvement Act, 1862), secs. 84 and 89—Stat. 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91 (Valuation Act, 1854), secs. 4, 8, and 11.

1. Section 84 of the General Police Act enacts,—“Once in each year the commissioners . . . shall assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland . . . in the sums necessary to be levied for the police purposes of this Act, . . . and shall fix a day on which the same shall be payable: . . . Provided always that such assessment shall be imposed as from the 15th day of May in one year to the 15th day of May in the following year, and shall not exceed a rate equal to”

Section 89 enacts,—“The assessments hereinbefore authorised to be imposed shall be levied from the occupiers of lands or premises, but deduction shall be allowed by the commissioners of the assessment for any period during which any lands or premises shall not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year, and owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for less than a year shall themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the said assessment applicable to any period less than a year, and the same may be recovered from such owners or from such occupiers as the commissioners shall judge expedient.”

On 8th September 1879 the commissioners of police in a burgh resolved to assess for the year from 15th May 1879 to 15th May 1880 according to the valuation-roll for that year (which was not then completed, in so far as appeals against it could not be finally disposed of prior to 30th September), at a certain rate per pound, and declared that the owners of premises let for periods less than a year should be responsible for the rates their tenants failed to pay.

The owner of houses let continuously for a year in successive short periods, sometimes to the same tenant, and sometimes to various tenants, objected to an assessment levied upon him as an owner responsible for his tenants (1) on the ground that the assessment was not valid, having been imposed at a time when the valuation-roll had not been finally completed, and (2) that section 89 only applied in cases where a house let for periods less than a year was vacant for some portion of the year.

POLICE—Continued.

Objections repelled. Burgh of Partick v. Marshall, Feb. 16, 1881, p. 480.
Public burden—Burgh assessments—Public charity—Liability of charitable hospital for assessments—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (Stat. 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 32).

2. The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 70, exempted from burgh assessment "any house or building which is solely occupied for purposes of public charity, or any premises exempted from taxation by public law." The directors of a charitable hospital in Edinburgh, in order to extend the usefulness of the hospital, opened certain additional wards—which they had otherwise not sufficient funds to support—to patients who should pay 3s. per day for board. Held that the fact that certain patients contributed to the cost of their own maintenance did not deprive the hospital of the character of a building "solely occupied for purposes of charity," and that it was entitled to exemption. Chalmers's Hospital v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, March 8, 1881, p. 577.

POOR. Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), secs. 69 and 76—Interruption of acquisition of residential settlement by obtaining medical advice and drugs from the parochial board.

1. Held that the acquisition of a residential settlement was interrupted by the pauper having applied for and obtained medical advice and drugs to the extent of 2s. 2d. from the parochial board. Wallace v. Dempster and Deas, Oct. 22, 1880, p. 27.

Residential Settlement—Sailor—Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 76.

2. A sailor maintained his wife and family for six months in partly furnished lodgings, and thereafter for four and a half years in a house rented by him as tenant in the parish. When at home between voyages he resided with his wife and family. Held that he had acquired a settlement by five years' residence. Wallace v. Beattie and Highet, Jan. 6, 1881, p. 345.

Birth Settlement—Settlement of child born in poorhouse of one parish situated in another parish.

3. The parish of A built a poorhouse in the parish of B. A child born of a pauper in that poorhouse afterwards became chargeable on its birth parish. Held that the parish of B and not that of A was liable. Russell v. Greig and Craig, Jan. 26, 1881, p. 440.

Pauper Lunatic—Relief—Lunacy Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 54), secs. 14 and 15.

4. A family consisted of a father and mother and nine children, five being sons and four daughters. One of the sons was an imbecile. The father had an annual income of £120; two of the sons contributed between them £65 per annum to the household expenses; and two of the daughters were in service. Held that, in the circumstances, the father had no claim to be relieved by the parochial board of the maintenance of his imbecile son in an asylum. Beattie v. Grozier, June 7, 1881, p. 787.

POOR'S-ROLL. Poor-roll—Admission where the reporters on the probablis causa litigandi are equally divided in opinion—A.S. 21st November 1842, sec. 1.

1. Where the reporters on the probablis causa litigandi reported to the Court that two of them were of opinion that an applicant had, and two of them were of opinion that she had not a probablis causa, the Court (dis. Lord Shand) admitted the applicant. Marshall v. North British Railway Co., July 13, 1881, p. 939.

Time of stating objections where admission applied for.

2. Held, following Allan v. Allan, Feb. 28, 1872, 10 Macph. 510, that objections to admission to the benefit of the poor's-roll (on grounds other than the want of probablis causa) should be stated when the application is moved in the Single Bills, and before a remit is made to the reporters on probabilis causa. Douglas v. M'Veigh, March 18, 1881, p. 667.

POOR'S-ROLL—Continued.

See Process, 21.

POWER OF APPOINTMENT. See Faculty and Powers.

PRESCRIPTION.

Deduction of years of minority—Verus dominus—Road—Right of way.

1. An estate was conveyed to a father in liferent for his liferent use only, and to the heirs of his body in fee. The father died during the minority of his two daughters, who succeeded as heirs-portioners. In an action raised at their instance to have it declared that a certain road which passed through the estate had not been used as a public road during the forty years necessary to found prescriptive use, held that in reckoning the years of prescription they were entitled to a deduction of that part of their minority which occurred subsequent to their father's death, and not of that part which preceded it, on the ground that prior to their father's death the pursuers had no vested right. Black v. Mason, Feb. 18, 1881, p. 497.

Royal Burgh—Harbour Dues.

2. Held that a charter of royal burgh is a habile title on which to prescribe a right to exact harbour and shore dues, and that the usage of exaction for more than the prescriptive period will fix the limits of the right. Macpherson v. Mackenzie, May 21, 1881, p. 706.

See Agent and Client, 2.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE See Interdict.

PROCESS. Procedure generally.

Exhibition of Titles.

1. When in an action of exhibition the Court is satisfied that the titles called for should be produced, the proper course is to ordain them to be exhibited in the hands of the clerk of Court. Clark v. Melville, Nov. 16, 1880, p. 81.

See also Bankruptcy, 1.

Issue—River—Nuisance.

2. In an action by riparian proprietors on the banks of a river, to prevent pollution by owners of mills on the river, and others, an issue was adjusted by the Lord Ordinary whether the defenders polluted the river "to the nuisance of the pursuers or their authors, or one or more, and which of them." Held that the words "and which" were a departure from the ordinary style of issue, and should be struck out, diss. Lord Shand, who held that it was unnecessary to alter the issue adjusted by the Lord Ordinary, as with or without the words "and which" the issue was fitted to try the case. Earl of Southesk v. Inch Bleaching Co. &c., March 5, 1881, p. 573.

Forms of issues for wrongous use of diligence. See Bill, 3.

Competency—Value of Cause—Judicature Act, 1825 (50 Geo. III. cap. 112), sec. 28—Conclusion ad factum præstandum.

3. Held that an action in the Court of Session for delivery of fifteen I O U's, representing in toto the sum of £16, 18s. 6d., was not incompetent. Henry v. Morrison, March 19, 1881, p. 692.

Remit to Lord Ordinary to allow a Proof—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 62.

4. Section 62 of the Court of Session Act enacts that "when proof shall be ordered by one of the Divisions of the Court it shall no longer be competent to remit to one of the Lords Ordinary to take such proof, but it shall be taken before one of the Judges of the said Division." Held (after consultation with the Judges of the Second Division) that this did not apply to a case where the Court recalled an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary dismissing an action as irrelevant, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof. Main (Fleming's Trustee) v. Fleming's Trustees, June 30, 1881, p. 880.

Entail—Form of interlocutor where reclaimer's counsel were unable to submit argument in support of reclaiming note.

5. In an action for declarator that three deeds of entail were invalid, in respect that they contained no irritant clauses against altering the order of succession, the Lord Ordinary declared the deeds invalid. The defender reclaimed, but, at the hearing, her counsel stated, that, in consequence of the current of decision, they were unable to submit an argument in support of the reclaiming note. Held that the Court should pronounce an interlocutor to the effect that, having heard counsel for the reclaimer, they refused the reclaiming note and adhered. Colville v. Marindin, July 12, 1881, p. 937.

PROCESS—Continued.

Petition—Restriction of Aliment.

6. It is competent for a person against whom a decree for aliment has been pronounced to present a petition praying the Court to restrict the amount of future aliment. Macdonald v. Macdonald, July 19, 1881, p. 985.

Amendment of Record—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

7. Observed (per Lord Watson) that the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, did not warrant the importation of a new party into a suit for the purpose of obviating an objection to the title to sue of the original pursuer. Hislop v. M'Ritchie, &c., June 23, 1881, H. L., p. 95.

Jury Trial—Place and time of trial.

8. Circumstances in which the Court refused a motion to have a case tried in Edinburgh instead of at Glasgow Circuit. Macpherson v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 6, 1881, p. 901.

Jury Trial—Abandonment by not proceeding to trial within twelve months of issues being adjusted—Question, Whether A. S., Feb. 16, 1841, sec. 46, is still applicable—13 and 14 Vict. c. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 40.

9. In this action issues were adjusted on 16th May 1880, and the case was set down for trial on 16th July 1880. On 8th July the order for trial was discharged, by reason of the Lord Ordinary who was to preside at the trial being required to attend the trial of an election petition in the country. No step was taken in the case by either party until 14th July 1881, when the defender gave notice of a motion that in terms of the 46th section of A.S., Feb. 16, 1841, the pursuer should be held as confessed, in respect he had not proceeded to trial within twelve months from the adjustment of issues, and that decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

The pursuer then, on 15th July 1881, gave notice of trial for the next Christmas sittings.

Held that the Act of Sederunt did not apply, and that under the 40th section of the Court of Session Act he was entitled to have a day fixed for trial. Baird v. Cornelius, July 16, 1881, p. 982.

Questions of Expenses.Expenses—Bankrupt—Caution for expenses in a reclaiming note where fraud alleged—Reduction.

10. In an action of reduction on the ground of fraud the Lord Ordinary granted decree against the defender. When a reclaiming note for the defender was called in the Single Bills, counsel for the pursuer moved that the defender should be ordained to find caution for expenses, on the ground that he was bankrupt, and that the trustee in his sequestration had failed to sist himself as a party to the cause.

The Court refused the application, with expenses, on the ground that the general rule in such cases was that a defender was not obliged to find caution for expenses of process (Taylor v. Fairlie, March 1, 1833, 6 W. and S. 301), and that here, the bankrupt's character being assailed, the rule should clearly be applied. Buchanan v. Stevenson, &c., Dec. 7, 1880, p. 220.

Expenses—Fees to Counsel where case has extended over more than one day.

11. The fact that the hearing of a case has been continued from one day to another is not in itself a reason why an additional fee should be sent to counsel. Brady v. Watson, decided March 15, 1881, reported of date March 19, 1881, p. 694.

PROCESS—Continued.

Caution for expenses—Bankrupt—Trust for creditors—Bankrupt suing trustee to account.

12. A bankrupt who had granted a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors sued his trustee to account for a balance of funds which he alleged was in the trustee's hands. Held that he was entitled to sue the action without finding caution for expenses.

Observations (per Lord Young) on the grounds on which the Court will order caution for expenses to be found. Ritchie v. M'Intosh (Ritchie's Trustee), June 2, 1881, p. 747.

Expenses—Jury Trial—Fees to Counsel.

13. In a jury trial relating to a right of way, which lasted from 10 a.m. till 6.30 p.m. of each of three days, the Court refused to allow as charges against the losing party more than the usual fees to counsel, viz, twenty, fifteen, and ten guineas to senior counsel, and fifteen, ten, and seven guineas to junior counsel. Black v. Mason, March 18, 1881, p. 666.

Expenses—Proof—Copies of evidence for debate before Lord Ordinary.

14. Exceptional circumstances, under which the charge for one copy of the evidence for use of counsel at an adjourned hearing on evidence in the Outer-House was allowed against the losing party. Powrie v. Louis, June 15, 1881, p. 803.

Expenses—Appeal—Amount of expenses allowed when appeal withdrawn in Single Bills.

15. An appeal against a judgment of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire was lodged in August and appeared in the Single Bills of the first day of the next session. Counsel for the appellant then moved the Court for leave to withdraw the appeal. The Court allowed this to be done on condition of payment of £3, 3s. of expenses to the respondent, and fixed that sum as the amount of expenses to be awarded in similar cases. Gentles v. Beattie, Oct. 15, 1880, p. 13.

Expenses—Appeal—Where appeal withdrawn after printing by respondent.

16. An appeal was sent to the Short Roll upon the 15th October. The appellant, on the 2d November following, moved in the Motion Roll that it be dismissed, with modified expenses. The respondent asked to be allowed full expenses, as he had been put to considerable expense in printing documents in preparation for the discussion of the case. Appeal dismissed, the respondent being found entitled to full costs, as taxed. Smith Sligo v. Knox, Nov. 2, 1880, p. 41.

See Agent and Client, 4—Husband and Wife, 1, 8—Judicial Factor, 1.

Appeals from Sheriff Courts.

Appeal—A. S., 10th March 1870—Omission to lodge prints in due time.

17. Circumstances in which the Court sent an appeal from the Sheriff Court to the roll although the appellant had failed to lodge prints within fourteen days after the process had been received by the Clerk of Court, as required by sub-sec. 1 of sec. 3 of A. S., March 10, 1870. Greig v. Sutherland, Nov. 3, 1880, p. 41.

Appeal—Competency—Judicature Act, 1825, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, sec. 40—Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, sec. 5.

18. A Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof on 2d September, and thereafter pronounced three interlocutors discharging the diets for taking the proof and fixing new ones, stating in a note to his last interlocutor that no further indulgence would be allowed to the defender. The defender appealed to the Sheriff-principal, who dismissed the appeal. The Sheriff-substitute, on 15th December, assigned as a new diet of proof the 20th December. The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Appeal dismissed as not timeously presented, the interlocutor of 2d September requiring to be appealed against within fifteen days under the 40th section of the Judicature Act and the 5th section of the A. S. of 1828, and the interlocutor of 15th December not being an allowance of proof or the renewal of an allowance of proof. Kinnes v. Fleming, Jan. 15, 1881, p. 386.

PROCESS—Continued.

Appeal—Leave to Appeal—Act 50 Geo. III., c. 112, sec. 36—A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, c. 19, sec. 2.

19. The A. S. 12th Nov. 1825 contains this section,—“The liberty of advocating interlocutory sentences to the Court of Session, in the cases allowed by the Act 50 Geo. III. cap. 112, sec. 36, must be obtained upon an application by petition to the Sheriff. This petition must not contain any argument, but shall merely relate the interlocutors to be advocated.”

Held that the section merely regulates the mode of obtaining leave to appeal in cases where such leave is necessary. Miller v. Crawford, Jan. 15, 1881, p. 385.

Appeal—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., cap. 96) —Addition of plea after case decided in inferior Court—Pars Judicis.

20. When, in an action under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, a person having sufficient means to enable him to employ an agent conducts his own cause he will not, in an appeal against the judgment, be entitled to state a new plea. Simpson v. Selkirk, Feb. 2, 1881, p. 469.

Appeal—Act of Sederunt 10th March 1870, sec. 3, sub-sec. 1—Time for application to dispense with printing.

21. The process in an appeal from the Sheriff Court was received by the Clerk of Court upon 21st February. Upon the appellant's application to be admitted to the benefit of the poor's-roll, a remit was made on the 25th February to the reporters on probabilis causa litigandi. On 4th March the appellant presented a note to the Court praying them “to dispense hoc statu with printing, or otherwise, to extend the time for printing until the application for the benefit of the poor's-roll should be disposed of.”

Motion refused, on the ground that it had not been made within eight days after the process had been received by the Clerk of Court, as required by sub-section 1 of section 3 of the Act of Sederunt 10th March 1870, but observed that it would be open to the appellant, within eight days after the appeal should be held to be abandoned under the 1st sub-section, to apply in terms of the 3d sub-section to be reponed upon cause shewn. Allan v. Sandeman, March 4, 1881, p. 563.

Appeal—Competency—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 32.

22. An interlocutor disposing of the whole merits of an action and awarding expenses was pronounced by a Sheriff-substitute on 10th March and adhered to by the Sheriff on the 31st, the unsuccessful party being found liable in the expenses of the appeal, “to be taxed and decerned for along with the other expenses.” The decree was extracted on 21st April. Subsequently, on 2d May, another interlocutor was pronounced, giving decree for the taxed amount of expenses. Against this interlocutor an appeal was taken to the Court of Session, with the view of bringing up the previous interlocutors in the case. Appeal refused, on the grounds (1) that, under the 32d section of the Court of Session Act, 1876, after extract no appeal is competent, and (2) that an interlocutor which merely awards expenses is not subject to review. Tennents v. Romanes, June 22, 1881, p. 824.

Appeal—Competency—Value of the cause—Statute 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80 (Sheriff Court Act, 1853), sec. 22.

23. A summary petition in a Sheriff Court craved an order against the defender for delivery of a machine, and failing delivery within a specified time to be fixed by the Court, decree for payment of “£6, 10s. as the value of the said machine.”

Held that as the prayer of the petition shewed that the value of the cause did not exceed £25 it was not competent to appeal the case to the Court of Session. Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Jessiman, May 14, 1881, p. 695.

Special Cases.

24. Observations on the form of special cases. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Inland Revenue, Nov. 18, 1880, p. 89.

See Poor's-Roll, 1 and 2—Teinds.

PROOF. Confidentiality—Reports to insurance companies by medical advisers.

In an inquiry regarding the probable duration of life of a first substitute heir of entail, with the view of ascertaining the value of the expectancy of the second and third heirs prior to the disentail of the estate, diligence granted (by Lord Fraser (Ordinary) and acquiesced in) for the recovery of certain medical reports in the hands of insurance companies with whom the life of the heir in question was insured, and plea of confidentiality stated by the haver repelled. McDonald v. McDonalds, Jan. 7, 1881, p. 357.

See Agent and Client, 1, 2.

PROPERTY. Urban tenement—Implied servitude of light and air.

1. A property company purchased, in one lot, a villa and surrounding garden ground. Thereafter they divided the subjects into two lots, the first of which consisted of a shop, which they had erected on the plot of ground lying to the front of the villa, and two cellars or warerooms—part of the sunk storey of the villa—which, for more than forty years, had received light and air through two small windows in the south gable, which overlooked the plot of ground adjoining. This lot the company sold to A, together with the solum of the piece of ground on which the shop was built, and a right of property in common with the proprietors of the villa in the solum of the piece of ground on which the warerooms were situated. In the following year the company sold the remainder of the property to B. This lot consisted of the villa, other than the part of the sunk storey already sold to A, together with a right of property, along with A, in the solum of the piece of ground on which said house was built, together with the piece of ground, or green, lying to the back and south of the house, with right to make use of it as absolute owner, it being thereby declared that there was no restriction against building, or any right of servitude affecting the said piece of ground. B erected on the piece of ground to the south of the house a wooden screen, in such a manner as to obstruct the windows of the warerooms. Held that he was not entitled so to obstruct the windows, on the ground that A's title gave him, as at the date of purchase, an implied servitude of air and light over the said plot of ground, and that the subsequent declaration in B's title, that there was not "any right of servitude affecting the said piece of ground," could not override the implied servitude. Heron v. Gray, Nov. 27, 1880, p. 155.

Trespass—Ferry—Road—Public right of way—Interdict.

2. The Clyde Navigation Trustees having obtained from a riparian proprietor a strip of ground on the bank of the river to be used solely for the purposes of widening and straightening the river, and having thereafter obtained by statute an existing right of ferry over part of the river extending above and below the said strip of ground, established a ferry service, and embarked and discharged passengers at a part of the bank so acquired, which was separated from any public place by the lands of the said proprietor. The proprietor sought to have the trustees interdicted from embarking and discharging passengers at the point in question.

Held that the action was wrongly directed against the trustees, and that the proprietor's proper remedy was an interdict against persons actually trespassing on his lands,—*dis*s. Lord Justice-Clerk, who held (1) that the establishment by the trustees of this ferry was contrary to the bona fides of their feu-contract with the complainer, and (2) that they had no right by statute or otherwise to establish a ferry except where they could communicate directly with some public place. Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, June 22, 1881, p. 826.

River—Nuisance—Interdict.

3. Where A feued part of his ground for the erection of dwelling-houses, and gave the feuars right to send sewage through a drain passing through the remainder of his ground into an ordinary field drain which communicated with an open ditch on an adjoining property belonging to B, held that B was entitled to interdict against A discharging the sewage into the said ditch. Scott v. Scott, June 28, 1881, p. 851.

PROPERTY—Continued.

Restraints on use of—Questions between proprietors of flats—Servitude—Light and air.

4. A lot of building ground, extending from the street in front to a meuse lane at the back, having been feued out, the feuar erected on it an ordinary common stair tenement, consisting of a main-door house and two flats and attics opening from the common stair. He afterwards sold off the house, "consisting of the ground and street storeys of the tenement lately erected" by him, "with the area at the back of the said tenement," &c. to one purchaser, and the common stair houses, with certain rights in the cellarage and front area, but with no express right to or in "the area at the back of the said tenement," to others.

The proprietor of the street and sunk floor, having converted them into a shop, proposed to extend his premises by building a saloon the height of his street floor terminating in a building at the back facing the meuse lane, and rising to a height of 19 feet 9 inches at the ridge of the roof, and 8 feet 9 inches at the wall head above the level of the top of his street floor. This building was to be brought within 21 feet 6 inches of the back wall of the street floor and of the common stair floors above.

Held that there was no limitation on the right of the proprietor of the street floor and back area, and, as no injurious diminution of light and air to the flats above was to be apprehended, warrant granted subject to conditions. Boswell v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 19, 1881, p. 986.

Superior and vassal—Special stipulations in feus—Restrictions on building—Enforcement by one vassal against another holding of common superior.

5. The fact of several feuars of adjoining plots of building ground in the same street holding from a common superior, does not, by itself, entitle any one of those feuars to claim the benefit of restrictions contained in the feu-contract of another unless some mutuality and community of rights and obligations is otherwise established between them, and this can only be done (1) by the superior making it an express condition of his feu-contract that he will insert the same general restrictions in all feus granted by him in the same street or locality; or (2) by reasonable implication from a reference in all the feu-contracts to a common plan or scheme of building prepared and adopted by the superior; or (3) by mutual agreement between the feuars themselves.

A superior feued out ground for building detached villas to form one side of a square on his property. All the feuars were put under restrictions as to building, but these restrictions, though similar, were not uniform, but adapted to the situation of the various houses, and there was no reference in the feu-contracts to any general building plan as having been adopted by the superior, and except that all the houses had a uniform frontage, so far as related to their distance from the street in front, no uniform plan appeared to have been adopted; nor was there any undertaking by the superior in any of the feu-contracts to impose the same or any restrictions upon adjoining feuars. A and B, who held adjacent feus, and whose houses had been built before the date of their feu-contracts, were each restricted from erecting additional buildings, with certain specified exceptions. The excepted buildings were different in each case, but both feuars were restricted from building on the front area between their houses and the street. Held (rev.^d judgment of Second Division) that the restrictive provision as to building in B's feu-contract did not create a ius quaesitum in favour of A, but was merely a condition of tenure between superior and vassal; and that A was not entitled to enforce it against B to the effect of preventing him enclosing the space in front of his house for the purpose of a carriage show-room. Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, H. L., p. 95.

Privileges stipulated for in disposition of heritable subjects—Destruction of subject—Whether privileges transmitted on reconstruction of subjects—Jus quaesitum tertio—Theatre.

6. The site of a theatre called "The Queen's Theatre and Opera House," as well as the theatre itself, were conveyed to A B by trustees acting for certain shareholders or rentallers, subject to the real burden of a perpetual annuity of £2 to each of the rentallers and their successors or assignees. It was further stipulated that each of the rentallers "shall at all times be entitled to free admission to the audience department of the said theatre other than the present private boxes; . . . but declaring that the said right of free admission shall be personal to each shareholder or rentaller; . . . and also providing and declaring that the said A B and his forebears shall not be entitled, without the consent of the said shareholders or rentallers, or their forebears, to convert the said theatre and opera house to any other use or purpose; and also providing and declaring that the said theatre and opera house shall be kept open for performances during at least six months of the year."

PROPERTY—Continued.

This theatre was burned down, as was also a second theatre built on the same site. A third theatre was erected and opened. These several theatres had on various occasions changed hands, but in each case the conveyance was made subject to the burdens incumbent on the disponent under the titles of said subjects, and specially, without prejudice to the said generality, the disponent was taken bound to pay the annuity of £2 to each of the rentallers, and to "allow these parties the privilege to which they were entitled."

The rentallers enjoyed unchallenged the privilege of free admission to the theatre, as rebuilt, for fourteen years after its first destruction by fire.

In a question between the lessees of the theatre and the rentallers, held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the privilege of free entry conferred on the rentallers by the original disposition was confined to the theatre in existence at the date of the deed, and expired with its destruction by fire, and that the subsequent conveyances to which the rentallers were not parties were not intended to confer, and did not confer, on them any new right. Scott, &c. v. Howard, &c., March 24, 1881, H. L., p. 59.

See Nuisance—Superior and Vassal, 8—Burgh, 3, 4.

PROVISIONS TO HUSBANDS, WIVES, &c. Antenuptial marriage-contract—Conveyance of universitas—Subsequent alterations in settlement.

A husband in an antenuptial marriage-contract conveyed his whole means and estate as at the date of his death to trustees, and therefrom provided £150 to his widow, "in full of all legal claims." He directed the residue of the estate to be divided equally among the children of a former marriage, and any children to be born of the present one. Two children were born of this marriage. The husband afterwards executed a trust-settlement, whereby he directed an additional payment of £300 to his widow, and also gave her the life interest of her children's shares of the residue, subject to the burden of alimentering them. Held that this was a fair and reasonable provision for the wife, and not a fraud upon the provisions of the antenuptial contract as regarded the children of the second marriage. Lowden's Trustees v. Lowden, &c., June 1, 1881, p. 741.

See Entail, 2, 5—Succession.

PUBLIC BURDEN. See Police, 2.

PUBLIC COMPANY. Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 121—Contributory—Suspension of a charge to pay calls granted without caution.

1. The liquidators in a joint stock bank, which was being wound up, came to an arrangement with one of the contributories, who was unable to pay the second call, that he should pay a sum of money and they should grant him a discharge. The authority of the Court was interposed to the compromise, and the money was paid. The liquidators refused to deliver the discharge, and obtained an order against the contributory for payment of the call, and caused him to be charged thereon. They averred that the contributory had not made a fair disclosure of his affairs before obtaining the discharge, and in particular that he had not disclosed the fact that he had recently become a partner of a trading company. They also averred that after the date of the compromise he had paid money into the copartnership funds.

PUBLIC COMPANY—Continued.

In the special circumstances of the case note of suspension of the charge to pay a call passed without caution. Anderson v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank, Nov. 5, 1880, p. 44.

Winding up—Shareholder holding for himself and as executor—Construction of terms of compromise by surrender.

2. In a winding up a person was placed upon the list of contributories (1) in his own right, and (2) as one of two executors upon the estate of the deceased. He failed to pay the calls made upon him in the first capacity, but he paid those made on him in the second. Terms of an agreement between him and the liquidators, under the sanction of the Court, by which the Court held that he had surrendered his whole estate, and that he was bound to give an assignation to all claims which might be competent to him in the future in respect of either holding.

Observations upon the meaning of "compromise" as applied to such an agreement. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank v. Mitchell, Nov. 26, 1880, p. 135.

Winding up—List of Contributories—Constitution of Membership.

3. In the winding up of a joint stock company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, to entitle the liquidators to place the representatives of a deceased person upon the list of contributories they must prove that before his death he was a registered shareholder, or was bound to the company to become so.

A person who had been a chief originator and adviser in the formation of a company, and who, along with others, had signed a paper agreeing to subscribe £1000 towards the capital of the company if it were started, died the day after the memorandum of association was registered, and previously to the allocation of the shares. Further, he had been one of the seven signatories required for the memorandum of association, where his name was entered for the statutory single share. Held that the deceased had incurred no liability to the company except as a party to the memorandum of association, by which he became bound to take one share. Molleson and Grigor v. Fraser's Trustees, March 17, 1881, p. 630.

Reduction of Capital—Companies Act, 1867, secs. 9 to 20—Companies Act, 1877, secs. 3 and 4—Procedure.

4. The New Zealand and Australian Land Company was formed by the amalgamation of two previously existing companies, and was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, with a capital of £2,500,000. Soon after its incorporation it was found advisable upon inquiry to reduce the valuation of the estates held by it in New Zealand and Australia by £250,000, the result of which was that the nominal capital was larger than actually existed in assets. A petition was subsequently brought, founding upon the Companies Acts, 1867, secs. 9 to 20, and 1877, secs. 3 and 4, asking the Court to pronounce an order confirming a reduction of capital by £250,000, to approve of the draft minute proposed to be registered in pursuance of the above sections, to authorise the registration of both, and further, to dispense with the words "and reduced" as part of the name of the company. It was stated that the shares were all fully paid up, and that the reduction proposed was unrepresented by available assets, and did not involve the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital. Orders pronounced. New Zealand and Australian Land Co. (Limited), March 19, 1881, p. 691.

Liability for calls where shares forfeited for non-payment—Want of Notice.

5. The articles of association of a limited company provided that "twenty-one days' notice at least shall be given of the time and place appointed by the directors for payment of every call," and "a call shall be deemed to have been made at the time when the resolution of the directors authorising such a call shall have been passed." They also provided (Rule 29) that "any shareholder whose shares have been forfeited shall notwithstanding be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of the forfeiture."

PUBLIC COMPANY—Continued.

A call was made upon the 14th June, payable in equal instalments upon the 21st July and 23d August following. On the 28th June, before the date when notice of the call required to be given to the shareholders, the shares of a member of the company were forfeited in respect of non-payment of former calls. He received no notice of the call of 14th June until 13th August, when a circular intimating it was sent to him.

Held that his liability to pay the call arose under rule 29 without notice. Ferguson v. Central Halls Co. (Limited), July 20, 1881, p. 997.

PUBLICATION. See Interdict.RAILWAY. Compensation—Injury to access by shutting public street—Lands injuriously affected—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., cap. 33), sec. 6.

1. A railway company in the exercise of their statutory powers closed two public streets. Held that the owner of subjects in the neighbourhood (no part of which had been taken), whose access to a leading thoroughfare had been thereby materially injured, was entitled to compensation under section 6 of the Lands Clauses Act, on the ground that his property had been injuriously affected. Walker's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 21, 1881, p. 405.

Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 6—Lands injuriously affected—Benefits from Railway.

2. Held that in determining the extent to which lands have been "injuriously affected" in the sense of section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, compensatory benefit arising from the formation of the railway is not to be taken into account. Ibid.

Injury to Access—Compensation claimed in ordinary action—Stat. 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19 (Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), sec. 17—Stat. 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33 (Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), sec. 6.

3. A person held a feu bounded on one side by a vacant piece of ground which the superior bound himself to form into a street, the feu being bound to maintain it when made. Subsequently a railway company scheduled this piece of ground, and obtained by a private Act (which incorporated the Railways and Lands Clauses Acts) compulsory powers to acquire it. They acquired it by voluntary agreement with the proprietor (the superior).

The railway company having lowered the level of the ground, and injured the feu's access, he raised an action of damages against them at common law, maintaining that, as he had not got the notice which sec. 17 of the Lands Clauses Act requires to be given to all the parties "interested" in lands prior to their purchase, the railway company were not entitled to found on the statutes.

Held that the pursuer had not such an interest in the ground as to entitle him to notice under sec. 17 of the Lands Clauses Act, and that his only remedy was a claim for compensation under sec. 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, on the ground that his feu had been injuriously affected. Lawson v. Caledonian Railway Co., Jan. 27, 1881, p. 442.

Judicial Factor—Powers—Management—Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126), sec. 4.

4. Held that a judicial factor appointed under the Railway Companies Act of 1867 has under and by virtue of his appointment the sole and exclusive power of management of the undertaking of the railway company, and of the whole works and property connected therewith. Haldane v. Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Co., March 18, 1881, p. 669.

Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., cap. 19), sec. 127—Deficiency of Poor's-rate, caused by lands being taken, to be made good—Poor.

5. The 127th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts that the promoters of an undertaking shall make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessment, which may occur during the progress of their works, in respect of lands taken for the purposes of their undertaking.

RAILWAY—Continued.

Held that in determining whether or not such deficiency exists in the assessment for poor's-rate in a particular parish, the company's undertaking, so far as within such parish, is to be regarded as a whole, and that whenever such undertaking as a whole affords an assessable value as great as or greater than the subjects taken afforded at the date of the company's special Act, there is, within the meaning of the 127th section, no deficiency to be made good, though certain particular parts of the subjects may still have no assessable value, the works being incomplete, or the land being superfluous land, and vacant. Hall v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Co., March 18, 1881, p. 687.

Judicial Factor—Special Powers—Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 126), sec. 4.

6. A judicial factor appointed on the undertaking of a railway company under sec. 4 of the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867, presented a note to the Court for authority to enter into negotiations for the sale of the line, and after considering the result of the negotiations, for authority to apply to Parliament for an Act authorising the sale of the line, or to raise capital by the issue of debentures. Held that the judicial factor did not require special powers to enter upon the negotiations. Haldane v. Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Co., July 20, 1881, p. 1003.

REAL BURDEN. See Sale of Heritage.

RECOMPENSE. Implied Contract—Architect's remuneration for preparation of plans.

An architect prepared detailed plans for covering a piece of ground with buildings to be erected by the proprietor. The buildings were not proceeded with, but the proprietor used the plans to his advantage in dealing with a purchaser of the ground. In an action by the architect for payment of his account the proprietor denied liability, on the ground that the plans had been furnished upon the footing of there being a competition. Held that, assuming the fact as stated by the defender, it lay upon the employer to prove that the employment was gratuitous, which he had failed to do, and decree given accordingly. Landless v. Wilson, Dec. 15, 1880, p. 289.

REDUCTION OF CAPITAL. See Public Company, 4.

REI INTERVENTUS. See Lease, 2, 6.

RELIEF. See Entail, 3—Superior and Vassal, 4, 5.

REPARATION. Wrongous information—Privilege—Malice and want of probable cause.

1. A tenant, while removing some flooring from his house was stopped by his landlord on the street; the tenant having refused to return with the flooring, which he claimed as his own, was given into custody by the landlord, but on being taken to the police-office was at once liberated. In an action for reparation held that the landlord had in the circumstances been guilty of such recklessness in giving the tenant into custody as to amount in law to malice, and damages given accordingly. Denholm v. Thomson, Oct. 22, 1880, p. 31.

Oral slander—Issues—Counter issue of Law of Foreign State.

2. In an action of damages for oral slander between two domiciled Scotchmen the slander was alleged to have been uttered in Penang. The defender proposed this counter issue, "Whether, according to the law of Penang, no reparation is due for verbal slander unless special damage is proved." Counter issue disallowed.

Opinions that the case fell to be tried as if the slander had been uttered in Scotland. M'Larty v. Steele, Jan. 22, 1881, p. 435.

Wrongous use of diligence—Form of issue.

3. Forms of issue to try a question of wrongous filling up of and indormation of a blank bill, and of wrongous apprehension and imprisonment on a meditatione fugæ warrant. M'Meekin v. Russell and Tudhope, March 9, 1881, p. 587.

REPARATION—Continued.

Damages—Road—Duty of driver to keep at a distance from carriages in front.

4. Two omnibuses were being driven along a narrow road at a moderate speed, and a number of children were running after the first omnibus. One of the children, a boy of six years of age, having fallen, the driver of the second omnibus was so near that he could not pull up his horses in time, and the wheel of his omnibus went over the boy and killed him. In an action of damages by the father of the boy, held that it was the duty of the driver of the second omnibus to keep a sufficient distance between his own omnibus and the one in front to allow him to draw up if one of the children fell, and having failed to do so, that the proprietor of the omnibus and the driver were liable in damages. Auld v. M'Bey, &c., Feb. 17, 1881, p. 495.

Slander—Issue—Innuendo.

5. A man wrote an anonymous letter to his sister-in-law, whose husband was at sea, in which he stated that Mrs B, the person with whom she lived, had not been her friend in days past, and then "the writer hopes to hear of different behaviour and not going under the roof of any one but the one you should, viz, your mother, or go to some place where drink and your present companions won't get near you, so that temptation will be out of your way." In an action of damages for slander by Mrs B and her husband, held (rev. judgment of Lord Adam) that these words would not found an innuendo that Mrs B and her husband were keepers of a house of disreputable character, and action dismissed as irrelevant. Brydone v. Brechin, May 17, 1881, p. 697.

Liability of owner of dog for damage.

6. Held that the owner of a dog, known by him to be ferocious, is bound to take, not only reasonable, but effectual, precautions against its attacking the public, and that, in the event of the precautions taken proving insufficient, he will be liable in damages to the injured person. Burton v. Moorhead, July 1, 1881, p. 892.

See also Agent and Client, 3.

REFUTED OWNERSHIP. See Right in Security, 1.RETENTION. Accountant's right to retain his employer's documents—Implied contract—Law-agent's lien.

1. A merchant placed certain documents in the hands of a firm of accountants to enable them to collect debts due to him. Shortly after he became insolvent, and granted a disposition omnia bonorum in favour of a trustee for behoof of his creditors. The trustee applied to the accountants for the documents, but they refused to give them up till their account for charges and outlay incurred in collecting the debts was paid. Held that they were entitled to retain the documents on the ground of implied contract.

Opinions that this was not a proper case of lien, but simply of right under a contract. Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard, Nov. 6, 1880, p. 69.

General Lien—Auctioneer.

2. A firm of auctioneers received horses to sell on commission and kept them in stables in connection with their sale yard until they were sold, and made advances against them to the owner. There had been a previous course of dealing between the parties, on which a balance arose in favour of the auctioneers. The owner having become bankrupt, held (dis. Lord Craig-hill) that the auctioneers were entitled to a lien over the horses in their stables for the general balance due to them on all their transactions with him. Miller v. Hutcheson & Dixon, Feb. 16, 1881, p. 489.

See Sale, 5—Bankruptcy, 6.

REVENUE. Inhabited House Duty—48 Geo. III. c. 55, sch. B, rules 5 and 6—41 Vict. c. 15, sec. 13, sub-secs. 1 and 2.

1. The Corporation of Glasgow, as trustees under a local Act, were owners (1) of a building occupied by them as an industrial and natural history museum, to which the public were admitted free ; and (2) of a building partly occupied by them as picture galleries, to which the public were admitted free, and partly by an institute of engineers, to whom separate rooms were let by the Corporation.

REVENUE—Continued.

Held that the whole of these premises were liable for inhabited house duty under 48 Geo. III. c. 55, and did not fall under the exemption of 41 Vict. c. 15, sec. 13, sub-secs. 1 and 2, as "occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business, &c. by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit." Corporation of Glasgow v. Inland Revenue, Oct. 19, 1880, p. 17.

Repayment of Inventory-Duty—5 and 6 Vict. c. 79, sec. 23—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), secs. 74, 75, and 76.

2. Executors gave up an inventory of the personal estate of the deceased, in which stock of a bank was entered as an item at the market price of the day. Before the stock was realised the bank stopped payment, and having gone into liquidation large calls were made in respect of the stock far in excess of the whole estate left by the deceased. Held (1) that the fact that the stock turned out to be worthless did not entitle the executors to a repayment of inventory-duty, as the stock was properly valued in the inventory at the market price of the day ; (2) that a repayment of inventory-duty fall to be made in respect of the calls paid by the executors, as these were payments of debts due by the deceased ; (3) that the executors were entitled to no other return of inventory-duty either in respect of the assignation of the shares to the liquidators, when they were of no value, or in respect of the whole executry estate having been lost. Galletly's Trustees v. Lord Advocate, Nov. 12, 1880, p. 74.

Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 97)—Discharge (on redemption of feu-duty).

3. By feu-contract, which had been duly stamped with the ad valorem duty chargeable at its date in respect of the feu-duty, the vassal was bound to pay an annual feu-duty of £500, but it was provided that it should be in his power at any time to redeem the said feu-duty, or any part thereof, at the rate of twenty years' purchase, and that he should be bound, if required, to redeem the feu-duty at the said rate to the extent of at least £200, £100 within five years and another £100 within ten years from the term of entry under the feu-contract.

Held that the discharge granted by the superior in respect of the redemption of the feu-duty to the extent of £100 under the above obligation was chargeable with the duty imposed in the schedule appended to the Stamp Act, 1870, upon a "Release or Renunciation" of any right or interest in any property in any other case than "upon a sale," or "by way of security," viz., 10s., and not with the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty. Gibb v. Inland Revenue, Nov. 24, 1880, p. 120.

Income-Tax—Deductions for Wear and Tear—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35), sec. 100, schedule D, case i. rule iii.—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 12—Finality of Commissioners' decision on questions of fact.

4. Sec. 12 of the Customs and Revenue Act, 1878, provided that the Commissioners should, "in assessing the profits or gains of any trade . . . chargeable under schedule D, or the profits of any concern chargeable by reference to the rules of that schedule, allow such deduction as they may think just and reasonable as representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear during the year of any machinery or plant used for the purposes of the concern." The commissioners in assessing a railway company under schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, for income-tax, allowed a deduction from income of sums expended or set aside for renewal and repairs of plant during the year. The company demanded a further deduction under sec. 12 of the Act of 1878, of a sum representing the diminished value by reason of wear and tear of new additional plant purchased within five years which had hitherto required no repairs. The Commissioners refused the additional deduction, holding that the deduction allowed to the railway company from year to year for actual renewal and repairs of the plant was all to which they were entitled.

REVENUE—Continued.

In an appeal by the railway company, upon a special case stated by the Commissioners, the Court held that there was no ground for altering the determination of the Commissioners.

Observations on the form of special cases. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Inland Revenue, Nov. 18, 1880, p. 89.

Stamp Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 97, sec. 73—Conveyance on sale—Subject to real burden—Ad valorem duty, how fixed.

5. Section 73 of the Stamp Act, 1870, enacts,—“Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, such debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty.”

Where a heritable property was conveyed in consideration of a debt due by the disponent to the donee, but subject to a bond over the property, held that the consideration on which ad valorem duty fell to be paid was the debt due by the disponent plus the amount of the burden. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank, Jan. 15, 1881, p. 390.

Inhabited House-Duty—Hotel—Hydropathic Establishment—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1871, 34 and 35 Vict. c. 103, sec. 31.

6. Held that section 31 of the above Act restricting to sixpence per pound the inhabited house-duty on houses occupied by any person who shall carry on therein “the business of a hotel-keeper or an innkeeper or coffeehouse-keeper,” although not licensed, &c., applied to a house occupied as a hydropathic establishment. Strathearn Hydropathic Company (Limited) v. Inland Revenue, June 14, 1881, p. 798.

Excise—Spirits Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict. cap. 114), secs. 170-188—Entries in dealer's stock-book (1) where spirits obtained by “grogging,” and (2) where “samples.”

7. Held, upon a construction of the 170th to the 188th sections of the Spirits Act, 1860, that, alike with spirits obtained by “grogging” as with those received in the ordinary way, an omission by the dealer or retailer to insert in his stock-book the number of the permit or certificate, the Christian and surname of the person, or the name of the firm, from whom, and of the place from which the spirits were received, will entitle the Commissioners of Excise to disregard those entries, and will involve the statutory penalty if the amount of spirits in possession exceeds the amount duly entered.

Held that a dealer in spirits, whom the Commissioners of Excise had allowed to take samples of spirits out of bond, free from duty, and without a permit or certificate, was entitled, after using them for the purposes of his business, to put the surplus into stock, and that the Commissioners in balancing his stock-book were bound to take into account the entries therein of such spirits. Yeoman v. McIntosh Brothers, June 22, 1881, p. 840.

Income-Tax—5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 60, schedule A, rule 3, sec. 100, schedule D, rule 3, and sec. 159—29 Vict. c. 36, sec. 8.

8. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that a tenant of a mineral field in computing “the profits received therefrom” for assessment of income-tax is not entitled to write off and deduct from the gross earnings of any particular year a sum to represent the capital expended in pit-sinking exhausted by the year's workings.

Question, whether in any case expenses of sinking pits can be allowed as deductions from gross profits in assessing for income-tax. Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, April 7, 1881, H. L., p. 67.

REVOCATION, IMPLIED. See Succession, 4.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Security over moveables—Lease—Possession—Reputed ownership.

1. The proprietor of a new hotel (which required £20,000 to furnish it) in letting it to a tenant agreed to advance £10,000, to be expended on furniture, on condition that furniture to that value should be placed in certain rooms and inventoried as his property, and that the tenant should lease this furniture for ten years at a rent equal to 5 per cent on the sum expended by the landlord. There was also a separate agreement that the tenant should purchase the furniture in ten lots by yearly payments of £1000, the furniture rent being reduced in proportion as the payments were made. In terms of this agreement the furniture was purchased and inventoried, and the agreement itself was subsequently embodied in formal deeds. The tenant, after making three half-yearly payments of the furniture rent, and paying for one lot of the furniture, became bankrupt. In a question between the landlord and the trustee in the tenant's sequestration, who claimed the whole furniture as the property of the tenant, maintaining that the arrangement was merely a device to create a security over the furniture without possession by the creditor, held that the agreement was lawful, and that in terms thereof the landlord was proprietor of the furniture standing in his name, and that the tenant had possession of it merely on a contract of hire. Duncanson v. Jefferies' Trustee, March 4, 1881, p. 563.

Ex facie absolute disposition—Debtor left in possession—Summary ejection.

2. A building society held a security for advances to one of its members over heritable property by way of ex facie absolute disposition duly recorded. Their debtor received no proper back-letter, but the rules of the society provided that he should remain in possession on certain conditions, and in the event of his falling in arrear with his instalments and interest, that it should be "in the power of the society, without any warning or legal process of any kind whatever, to enter into possession of the property," "and if such member shall be in the actual possession or occupancy of the premises, to remove him therefrom."

Held that a petition for summary ejection at the instance of the society against their debtor was incompetent. Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society v. Horne, May 31, 1881, p. 737.

See Sale of Heritage—Sale, 5 and 6.

RIVER. Burn—Alteration of course—Mora.

1. The tenant of a farm at the commencement of a nineteen years' lease diverted for drainage purposes the water of a small burn which followed a circuitous course through his farm into a straight channel which joined the original watercourse at right angles to it just before it entered B, an adjoining property. The tenant raised an embankment opposite the junction to prevent the water overflowing upon the lower part of his farm. The effect of his operations was, in time of flood, to throw gravel on two acres of pasture ground on B.

The proprietor of B objected to the operations when executed, but took no proceedings until the last year of the lease, when he raised an action concluding to have the tenant ordained to restore the burn to its former course, and for damages. Held that, in the circumstances, the defender was entitled to absolvitor. Murdoch v. Wallace, June 28, 1881, p. 855.

Navigable River—Foreshore—Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict., c. cxlix.), secs. 76 and 84—Right of Clyde Trustees to dredge the foreshore without consent of proprietor.

2. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that notwithstanding the general repeal of the previous Clyde Navigation Acts by section 3 of the Consolidation Act of 1858, the terms of section 76, read in connection with those of section 84, were sufficient to re-enact the powers of the trustees under the repealed Acts, inter alia, to dredge the river over a certain area till a depth of seventeen feet at neap tides was obtained at every part thereof, and that a riparian proprietor was not entitled to interdict the trustees dredging a portion of the foreshore within the said area, which had by a judgment of the House of Lords been held to belong to him, subject to any right which the public might have over the same, "and subject also to any rights conferred upon the trustees of the Clyde Navigation by their Acts of Parliament." Lord Blantyre v. Clyde Navigation Commissioners, March 7, 1881, H. L., p. 47.

RIVER—Continued.

See Process, 2.

ROAD. Burgh—Liability of the Magistrates of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs for damages for injury caused by insufficient fencing of road—General Police Act, 1862, secs. 147, 170, and 237.

1. Leith was originally a burgh of barony, holding of Edinburgh, but after 1832 it became a parliamentary burgh, and there were subsequent Acts dealing with the rights, powers, authority, and jurisdiction of the Magistrates. Ultimately in 1862 the burgh adopted the provisions of the General Police Act, 1862.

In an action of damages against the Magistrates of that burgh for injury sustained in consequence of their alleged neglect to fence and protect a parapet wall at Newhaven, within the parliamentary limits of the burgh, on the road leading by the shore from Leith to Granton, held (dub. Lord Deas) that as the road in question had not been placed by the statutes above referred to under the charge of the Magistrates, but remained under the county turnpike district road trustees, there was no liability attaching to the Magistrates either (1) at common law, or (2) under the General Police Act, 1862.

Observations upon the cases of Innes v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, M. 13,189; Threshie v. The Magistrates of Annan, 8 D. 276; and Dargie v. The Magistrates of Forfar, 17 D. 730. Harris v. Magistrates of Leith, March 11, 1881, p. 613.

Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51) secs. 7 and 37—Effect of adoption of Act in one county and not in adjoining county where bridge and road situated partly in both.

2. Held, where a bridge and road between two counties had been maintained by a trust under a private Act, that the effect of above Act was to continue the powers of the bridge trustees for the part of the road situated in the county which had not adopted the Roads and Bridges Act, and to destroy their powers over the part of the road situated in the county which had adopted the Act. Commissioners of Supply of Aberdeenshire v. Wellington Suspension Bridge Trustees, May 17, 1881, H. L., p. 93.

See Burgh, 3—Prescription, 1—Reparation, 4.

SALE. Stoppage in transitu—Ship.

1. A & Sons, Moscow and Birmingham, purchased goods from B & Co., Glasgow, to be shipped by C's "first steamer from Leith to Riga to A & Sons' orders." By the bills of lading, which bore that the goods had been shipped by A & Sons, the purchasers, they were to be delivered in good order at the port of Riga, "unto the agent of the R. D. Railway Company, to be by them forwarded in transit to A & Sons, Moscow." A & Sons became insolvent, whereupon B & Co. stopped the goods at Riga when in the hands of the railway company. Held that the goods were still in transitu when stopped. M'Leod & Co. v. Harrison, Dec. 7, 1880, p. 227.

Right of iron manufacturer to fulfil contract with iron not from his own works.

2. A firm of iron-merchants purchased a quantity of iron from a manufacturer, the quality being defined to be "Crown," to pass Lloyd's survey. The contract-note was written on paper of the manufacturer's, bearing a "crown" stamped on it, and "Brand, Moor," along with the manufacturer's name as manufacturer. Before all the iron was supplied the manufacturer closed his works owing to want of business. He then wrote to the buyers asking them to specify for the rest of the iron, and stating that he had arranged with another manufacturer to supply them. The buyers refused to do this, and declined to take any iron but the manufacturer's iron, alleging that that was what they had bought. In an action at the instance of the manufacturer for damages for breach of contract, held (following West Stockton Iron Co. v. Nielson & Maxwell, July 3, 1880, ante, vol. vii. p. 1055), that the iron tendered being of equal value with that contracted for, and the buyers having failed to make out that they had any special make in view, they were liable in damages. Johnson & Reay v. Nicoll & Son, Jan. 25, 1881, p. 437.

SALE—Continued.

Retention—Sale on credit—Resale, intimation of—Retention against sub-purchaser on bankruptcy of original purchaser.

3. S. & Co., on 9th and 10th February, sold certain lots of sugar to M. & Co., taking their acceptance, dated 14th February, at one month. The sugar remained with the refiners subject to S. & Co.'s control, but was entered in the stock-book of the latter as sold to M. & Co.

On 11th February M. & Co. sold the sugar to F, and gave him a delivery-order (dated 17th February) in his favour addressed to S. & Co., which he transmitted to them with a request to hold to his order. S. & Co. did not acknowledge the receipt of this order, but in their stock-book, of date 17th February, they entered against the parcels of sugar,—“Transferred by M. & Co. to F.”

M. & Co. became bankrupt on 13th March, and their bill for the sugar was dishonoured. On 19th March F demanded delivery of the sugar, which was refused by S. & Co. on the ground that they were entitled, on the bankruptcy of M. & Co., to retain till the price was paid.

Held that S. & Co., having sold on credit, were bound to deliver at the date when the delivery-order in favour of F was transmitted to them, the term of credit not having then expired, and the original purchasers, M. & Co., being still solvent; and that, having at that date received F's intimation of the resale and request to hold to his order, they were to be regarded as holding for F, and that they were barred from retaining against him on the bankruptcy of M. & Co. Fleming v. Smith & Co., Feb. 26, 1881, p. 548.

Condition precedent—Implement rendered impossible by vendee.

4. Where in a contract of sale there is a condition precedent, which the vendor has been prevented from fulfilling through the fault of the vendee, the condition is held to have been satisfied.

A contracted to furnish B with a steam navy of novel construction, which B was to accept if on trial it fulfilled the condition of excavating 350 cubic yards per day of ten hours “on a properly opened up face” at the C railway cutting. The C cutting was not opened for several months after the expected time, and the machine was in the meanwhile tried at another cutting, where it broke down. It was altered, repaired, and strengthened, and removed to the C cutting where it was again tried, but not on a face properly opened up, and again broke down, and B refused to give it any further trial. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that B having failed to give a proper opportunity for the stipulated test A was entitled to decree against him for the price of the machine. Mackay v. Dick & Stevenson, March 7, 1881, H. L., p. 37.

Delivery—Ship—Payment by instalments during construction—Bankruptcy of shipbuilder—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.

5. Held (in aff. judgment of Second Division) that the rule introduced by sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act whereby a purchaser's right to enforce delivery from the seller is secured against the subsequent diligence of the seller's creditors, “including sequestration,” applied in a case where a ship was sold by the builder in the course of construction, and remained in the seller's hands undelivered at the date of his sequestration.

Question, whether by the common law of Scotland the property of the ship passes to the purchaser without delivery as the instalments of the price are paid.

SALE—Continued.

Observations on the case of Simpson v. Duncanson, 1786, M. 14,204. M'Bain v. Wallace & Co., &c., July 27, 1881, H. L., p. 106.

Right in security—Security over moveables—Ship—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1.

6. A, a shipbuilder who had a vessel on the stocks, applied to B & Co., to whom he was already indebted, to assist him with advances to enable him to complete the vessel. B & Co. only consented on condition that the vessel should be sold to them by A on an absolute contract of sale, the price to be payable by instalments, as they considered that in no other way would they be safe to make the advances asked. This was agreed to, and an absolute contract of sale was entered into by the parties, unqualified in any way, though there was, admittedly at least, an honourable understanding that should the vessel realise a profit beyond the sum paid by B & Co., they would communicate the benefit to A.

The accommodation-bills above mentioned were not returned by B & Co. till after A's sequestration. The advances already made were attributed towards the agreed-on price, the balance of which was paid by instalments as required, for which receipts were granted by the seller "to account of the purchase price." At the same time, to raise money to keep the purchaser out of cash advances, bills to the necessary amount were drawn by B & Co. and accepted by A and discounted by B & Co. While the vessel was in course of completion B & Co entered into negotiations for the sale of the vessel, in which they described it as a vessel belonging to A in which they had a personal interest, as they were under considerable advances to A against the vessel. They did not succeed in selling the vessel, and before it was completed and delivered A was sequestrated.

Held that though the motive of the transaction undoubtedly was to secure the money which the purchasers had at stake, and the further sums which they were going to advance, and though there might be not only an honourable understanding but even a binding collateral agreement as to the appropriation of any surplus on the sale of the vessel over the sum advanced, still the contract was in its inception a clear contract of sale and nothing else, which fulfilled every condition of the provision of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 1, and that there was nothing in the transaction or the accompanying circumstances to affect the operation of that provision as regarded the rights of the creditors of the seller. Ibid.

See Horse, 2.

SALE OF HERITAGE. Articles of Roup—Objections to Title—Right in Security—Real Burden.

By his settlement T M disposed to his wife in liferent his heritable property, and gave her "the disposal, as she may direct, of the sum of £125 sterling, to be paid twelve months after his death, out of or from the house now occupied by K," being a part of his heritage. He then disposed this house and another adjoining it, after his own and his wife's death, to his brother G M, or to his heirs after him, and added, "but this allotment is subject to the payment by the said G M or his heirs, in twelve months after the death of my wife, of the sum of £300 sterling, to be disposed of as follows, viz.—£125 sterling as aforesaid to be willed or disposed of by my wife," and the rest in small legacies.

G M having died, another brother, A M, served heir to him, and made up a title proceeding on his service and T M's settlement. The widow was also infeft for her liferent.

During the widow's life A M borrowed money on the fee of the property, and, becoming insolvent, the subjects were sold by the creditors under the powers in their bond. The articles of roup obliged the exposers to deliver a formal and valid disposition of the subjects under the burden of the widow's liferent, and under the burdens, conditions, provisions, &c., specified, contained, or referred to therein, or in the title-deeds thereof, and stipulated that "in respect the exposers are not aware of any incumbrances affecting the said subjects," except their own bond, which they were bound to clear off, "they, the exposers, shall not be bound to furnish any certificate of searches of incumbrances."

SALE OF HERITAGE—Continued.

A list of titles was appended to the articles of roup, and included the settlement of T M.

The purchaser refused to pay the price until the subjects were cleared of the burden of £300 payable out of them in terms of T M's settlement.

Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the purchaser having bargained to take the subjects with any burdens which the title-deeds laid upon them, and having had the opportunity of examining the title-deeds, including the settlement of T M, was bound to accept the title tendered.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) that the burden of £300 imposed by the settlement of T M was not a real burden, but a personal obligation merely on G M and his heirs. Davidson v. Dalziel, &c., July 19, 1881, p. 990.

SCHOOLMASTER'S SALARY. See Bankrupt, 8.SEASHORE. Right of barony proprietor to exclude public from his private pier and harbour.

A proprietor of seaboard lands, with a barony title, who had built a quay upon the foreshore ex adverso of his barony, and had formed a small harbour, with a road giving access to it from a village on his estate, for more than forty years had exacted dues from coasting craft, but not from fishing-boats, for admission to the pier and harbour. In an action raised by him concluding for interdict to enforce payment of these dues by the lessees of oyster-fisheries, recently established in the neighbourhood, and by the owners of boats employed by them, held that, as the pursuer had no grant of harbour, he had no right to exclude the defenders from the use of that part of the shore where the harbour was built, or to exact harbour-dues, and defenders assoiilzied. Earl of Stair v. Austin, &c., Dec. 2, 1880, p. 183.

SECURITY OVER MOVEABLES. See Sale, 6—Right in Security, 1.SERVITUDE. Thirlage—Act 39 George III. cap. 55, secs. 1 and 4—Registration of abbreviate of decree of commutation.

Held (1) that the provision of the first section of the Act 39 George III. cap. 55, dealing with registration of the abbreviate of a decree of commutation of thirlage is merely directory, and that there is no implied nullity where it has not been recorded within sixty days after the verdict of the jury; and (2) that the words of the fourth section protect against challenge any verdict that may be recorded, although after the lapse of sixty days. Duchess of Sutherland v. Reid's Trustees, Feb. 25, 1881, p. 514.

Of Light and Air. See Property, 1, 4.

SHERIFF. Sheriff-clerk—Interim appointment of two Sheriff-clerks for separate divisions of a county. Lord Advocate, Oct. 16, 1880, p. 13.SHIP. Charter-party—Cesser clause, effect of—Bill of Lading, Charterer's obligation under.

1. A vessel was chartered for the voyage from Greenock to Monte Video at a slump freight of £550, and the charter-party bore that £150 was to be payable on clearing at Greenock, and "bills of lading for the balance payable abroad to be taken (sic) by the captain, on receipt of which documents all responsibility of charterer to cease." The vessel was loaded chiefly with coal. The charterer divided the slump freight among the various items of the cargo, and presented bills of lading, together making up the cumulo sum, for the master's signature, the charterer himself being consignee. In that for the coal there was entered 453½ tons, freight 22s. 6d. per ton. This the master signed, but the bill of lading had a note at the foot "weight and contents unknown." On arrival at Monte Video, the master, waiving his lien for freight, delivered the coal, which turned out only 398 tons, as weighed there. The agents for the charterer, in settling for the balance of freight, retained for coal alleged to be short delivered £24, and freight applicable thereto, £62.

SHIP—Continued.

In an action by the owners against the charterer for the balance of the freight stipulated for in the charter-party, held (1) that the action could not be sustained on the charter-party, in respect that, bills of lading having been granted for the freight, the cesser clause put an end to the charterer's obligation under the charter-party; (2) that the bill of lading only entitled the shipowners to recover the freight of the 398 tons proved to have been delivered; and (3) that as it had not been proved that any part of the cargo shipped had not been delivered, the defender was not entitled to retain the £24. Beynon, &c. v. Kenneth, March 10, 1881, p. 594.

Clean Bill of Lading—Charter-party.

2. In a charter-party the shipmaster and the charterer agreed that the vessel should load a full and complete cargo to be delivered at the port of discharge on payment of certain rates of freight, "the captain to sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter-party." A lien was given over the cargo for payment of freight, dead freight, and demurrage. When the lay-days expired the vessel was short of a full cargo by thirty-five tons. The master intimated a claim for dead freight and demurrage, and refused to sign bills of lading, unless qualified by a reference to the conditions in the charter-party. It was afterwards agreed that the charterer should fill up the ship, and that the captain should sign "clean bills of lading, but under protest for three days demurrage incurred here, to be settled at the port of discharge."

The captain still declined to sign bills of lading without this addition, "and all conditions as per charter-party." Held that, while prior to the agreement he was justified in so declining, he was thereby bound to sign clean bills, i.e., such as neither contained nor implied any reference to matters previously in dispute between the parties, and was not entitled to insist on the bills of lading containing a reference to the conditions of the charter-party.

Observed that a condition in a charter-party that the captain "should sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party" imported that the charterer might insert a different rate of freight from that stipulated in the charter-party, but not any farther departure from its provisions.

Observations as to the meaning of the term "clean bill of lading." Arrospe v. Barr, March 11, 1881, p. 602.

Agent and Principal—Election—Owner and Master.

3. Shipbrokers having made certain disbursements for a German vessel took bills for the amount from the master drawn upon the owner. The owner returned the bills unaccepted. The brokers then sued the master on the bills in the German Courts, but failed in obtaining decree, on the technical plea that the action was not brought within three months. They then raised an action in the Court of Session against the owner on the original debt. The defender pleaded that the pursuers, by electing to take the master as their debtor, were barred from suing the owner. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that the doctrine of election did not apply, as the pursuers had not obtained a judgment.

Observations (per Lord Young and Lord Craighill) on the liabilities of the owner and master of a ship for advances made to the master.

Priestley v. Fernie, June 23, 1865, 34 L. J. Exch. 172, commented on. Meier & Co. v. Kuchenmeister, March 17, 1881, p. 642.

See Sale, 1, 5, 6—Insurance, Marine.

SLANDER. See Reparation, 2, 4.

SPECIAL POWERS. See Minor and Pupil—Judicial Factor, 2.

SPONSIO LUDICRA. Agreements and contracts—Stock Exchange—Gaming transaction—Betting as to the rise and fall of stock.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) on the question whether contracts for the purchase and sale of shares when neither party intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay the differences according to the rise or fall of the market, is a gambling transaction, so as to deprive the parties of the aid of the Court in questions arising out of them. Risk v. Auld & Guild, May 27, 1881, p. 729.

STATUTES, CONSTRUCTION OF. Caledonian Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co., H. L., p. 23.

STATUTES, INDEX OF.

1469, c. 36. See Superior and Vassal, 6.

1696, c. 25. See Caution.

48 Geo. III. c. 55, schedule B, rules 5 and 6. See Revenue, 1.

50 Geo. III. c. 112, sec. 28. See Process, 3.

— Sec. 36. See Process, 19.

6 Geo. IV. c. 120 (Judicature Act, 1825), sec. 40. See Process, 18.

5 and 6 Vict. c. 35 (Income-Tax Act, 1842), sec. 60, schedule A, rule 3, sec. 100, schedule D, rule 3, and sec. 159. See Revenue, 8.

— Sec. 100, schedule D, case i., rule III. See Revenue, 4.

5 and 6 Vict. c. 79 (Stamp Act, 1842), sec. 23. See Revenue, 2.

8 and 9 Vict. c. 17 (Companies Clauses Act, 1845), secs. 46, 47, and 48. See Arrestment, 1.

8 and 9 Vict. c. 19 (Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), sec. 17. See Railway, 3.

— Sec. 127. See Railway, 5.

8 and 9 Vict. c. 33 (Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), sec. 6. See Railway, 1, 2, 3.

— Sec. 127. See Railway, 5.

8 and 9 Vict. c. 83 (Poor-Law Act, 1845), secs. 69 and 76. See Poor, 1.

— Sec. 76. See Poor, 2.

9 and 10 Vict. c. 17 (Exclusive Trading in Burghs Act, 1846). See Trading.

11 and 12 Vict. c. 36 (Entail Amendment Act, 1848), sec. 21. See Entail, 2.

13 and 14 Vict. c. 36 (Court of Session Act, 1850), sec. 40. See Process, 9.

16 and 17 Vict. c. 80 (Sheriff Court Act, 1853), sec. 22. See Process, 23.

17 and 18 Vict. c. 91 (Valuation Act, 1854), secs. 4, 8, and 11. See Police, 1.

18 Vict. c. 23 (Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855), sec. 1. See Succession, 9.

19 and 20 Vict. c. 60 (Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856), sec. 1. See Sale, 5, 6.

— Sec. 6. See Caution.

19 and 20 Vict. c. 79 (Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856), secs. 90, 91, and 92.

See Bankruptcy, 1; secs. 35, 38, and 101—Bankruptcy, 2; secs. 126 and 127—Bankruptcy, 3; secs. 19, 31, 169, 170—Bankruptcy, 5; sec. 103—Bankruptcy, 8; sec. 146—Bankruptcy, 9.

21 and 22 Vict. c. cxlix. (Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858), secs. 76 and 84. See River, 2.

23 and 24 Vict. c. 114 (Spirits Act, 1860), secs. 170, 188. See Revenue, 7.

24 and 25 Vict. c. 86 (Conjugal Rights Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1861), sec. 8. See Husband and Wife, 6.

— Sec. 16. See Husband and Wife, 10.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 54 (Lunacy Act, 1862), secs. 14 and 15. See Poor, 4.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (Companies Act, 1862), secs. 74, 75, and 76. See Revenue, 2.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, sec. 121. See Public Company, 1.

25 and 26 Vict. c. 101 (General Police and Improvement Act, 1862), secs. 84 and 89. See Police, 1.

— Secs. 147, 170, 237. See Road, 1.

STATUTES, INDEX OF—Continued.

Private Act—25 Vict. c. liii. (Edinburgh Roads and Streets Act, 1862), secs. 30 and 33. See Burgh, 1.

29 Vict. c. 36 (Customs and Revenue Act, 1866), sec. 8. See Revenue, 8.

30 and 31 Vict. c. 131 (Companies Act, 1867), secs. 9 to 20. See Public Company, 4.

30 and 31 Vict. c. 97 (Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867), sec. 3. See Trust, 2.

30 and 31 Vict. c. 96 (Debts Recovery Act, 1867). See Process, 20.

30 and 31 Vict. c. 126 (Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867), sec. 4. See Railway, 4, 6.

30 and 31 Vict. c. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868), sec. 62. See Process, 4.

31 and 32 Vict. c. 101 (Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868), sec. 8. See Superior and Vassal, 4; secs. 19 and 20—Succession, 10; sec. 20—Succession, 12; sec. 117—Succession, 2.

33 and 34 Vict. c. 97 (Stamp Act, 1870). See Revenue, 3.

— Sec. 73. See Revenue, 5.

34 and 35 Vict. c. 103 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1871), sec. 31. See Revenue, 6.

36 and 37 Vict. c. 63 (Law-Agents Act, 1873), sec. 21. See Agent and Client, 2.

37 and 38 Vict. c. 42 (Building Societies Act, 1874), sec. 14. See Friendly Society.

37 and 38 Vict. c. 94 (Conveyancing Act, 1874), sec. 4. See Superior and Vassal, 4.

38 and 39 Vict. c. clxvii. (North British Railway, Dundee and Arbroath Junction Line Act, 1879), secs. 3 and 6. Caledonian Railway Co. v. North British Railway Co., H. L., p. 23.

39 and 40 Vict. c. 70 (Sheriff Court Act, 1876), sec. 32. See Process, 22.

41 and 42 Vict. c. 26 (Companies Act, 1877), secs. 3 and 4. See Public Company, 4.

41 Vict. c. 15 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878), sec. 12. See Revenue, 4.

— Sec. 13, sub-secs. 1 and 2. See Revenue, 1.

41 and 42 Vict. c. 51 (Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878), secs. 7 and 37. See Road, 2.

42 and 43 Vict. c. 32 (Edinburgh Police Act, 1879), sec. 70. See Police, 2.

STIPEND, OBLIGATION TO RELIEVE OF. See Superior and Vassal, 7.

STOCKBROKER. See Agent and Principal, 2.

STOCK EXCHANGE. See Sponsio ludicra.

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU. See Sale, 1.

STREET. See Burgh, 1.

SUB-VASSAL. See Superior and Vassal, 10.

SUCCESSION. Period of payment—Intention of testator—Calendar or lunar month.

1. A testatrix directed her trustees, with all convenient speed, to collect and realise her moveable estate, and "as soon as convenient after my death to deliver, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death," to pay such bequests and legacies as should be directed by any writings under her hand. Lastly, the trustees were directed to pay the interest of the whole residue of the estate to the heir of entail in possession of a particular estate "at the said term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death,"—the first term's payment of said interest to commence "as at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas twelve months after my death." The testatrix died at nine in the morning of 15th May 1880. A question having arisen as to whether the legacies became payable at Martinmas 1880 or not until Whitsunday 1881, held that on a reasonable construction of the settlement, and in accordance with the evident intention of the testatrix, Martinmas 1880 was the first term six months after the testatrix's death, and that the legacies became payable then.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that the words "six months" fell to be construed as meaning six lunar months. Campbell's Trustees v. Cazenove, &c., Oct. 20, 1880, p. 21.

Heritable and Moveable—Heritable Security—Conveyancing Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 117.

2. Held in the construction of a will disposing of the testator's moveable estate, and of a trust-settlement containing a general conveyance of his whole heritable estate (both executed in 1872), that a bond heritably secured fell under the former and not under the latter deed, in respect that the Conveyancing Act of 1868 made such securities moveable as regarded the succession of the creditor. Guthrie, &c., Oct. 23, 1880, p. 34.

Cumulative provisions—Donation mortis causa.

3. A father bequeathed £400 to his daughter A, £400 to his daughter B, and directed his trustees to invest £400 for behoof of his daughter C in liferent allanarly, and of her children in fee. After the death of C's husband her father took her to live with him, and gave her from £40 to £50 a-year for her support. He subsequently lent £400 on the security of local rates, the destination in the bond being to C and her heirs. The bond was found in the father's repositories at his death. The Court, looking to the terms of the deeds and to the circumstances of the case, found that it was the testator's intention that his daughter C should receive both the provision under the will and that under the bond. Dewar or Milne v. Scott, Nov. 17, 1880, p. 83.

Implied revocation of codicil by subsequent codicil.

4. A testator died leaving a settlement, dated 8th February 1879, by the eighth purpose of which he bequeathed £18,000 to his nephew. By his eighth codicil, dated 17th November 1879, he reduced this legacy to £16,000. A twelfth codicil, dated 5th February 1880, provided—"In addition to the legacy or legacies left to my nephew . . . in the eighth purpose of my trust-disposition and settlement, which was executed by me in February last, I hereby leave him two thousand pounds stg. if my estate can afford it." In a question between the nephew and the residuary legatees, held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that the twelfth codicil, in referring to the eighth purpose of the original deed, had restored the bequest there given to its original amount, and had given £2000 in addition thereto. Best v. University of Edinburgh, Nov. 5, 1880, p. 66.

Patent ambiguity—Testamentary writing.

5. An old lady executed a settlement with five codicils all on one sheet of paper. She disposed a property she had to a niece whom she named her executrix and residuary legatee. By the first of the codicils she bequeathed, inter alia, "to Edward Whish, son of my cousin Margaret Whish, wife of Colonel Whish, five hundred pounds." The last codicil bore,—"I revoke the legacy of five hundred pounds to my cousin Mrs Whish" (there being no such legacy), "wife of Colonel Whish, and bequeath to her in place thereof the sum of £400, and I bequeath the £100 to T. H.," her husband's nephew. Two other papers were found in the testator's repositories giving directions to her executrix, and they shewed that she knew how much she possessed, and only meant to bequeath that amount, while if legacies were given to Edward Whish, Mrs Whish, and to T. H., the amount bequeathed would exceed by £500 the amount of the executrix estate. A letter of a subsequent date written by the testatrix to Mrs Whish was produced, in which she stated that Edward Whish was still to be her chief legatee, "but not for so large a sum as I intended," and then went on to bequeath her gold watch to him, and certain jewellery, &c., to other relations.

Held (1) that this letter, though not found in the testatrix's repositories, was of a testamentary nature, and that the explanations contained in it might be read along with the will and codicils; and (2) that her intention was to revoke the legacy of £500 only to the extent of the £100, bequeathed to T. H., her husband's nephew. Ritchie v. Whish, &c., Nov. 19, 1880, p. 101.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting—Conveyance to Trustees—Interposed life-tenant—Destination over.

6. A trust directed his trustees to pay to his wife a life-tenant of his whole estate, so long as she remained a widow, and "within twelve months after the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be," to convey certain heritable subjects to his wife's nephew, "A, and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to B," A's brother, "whom failing," &c. A predeceased the trustor's widow, who had not married again. Held that as the deed conferred no right upon A, apart from the direction to convey to him, no right vested in him prior to the date when the conveyance fell to be made. Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, &c., Nov. 26, 1880, p. 142.

Trust—Direction to sell.

7. A trust directed his trustees "twelve months after the death of my said wife and myself," to convey certain heritable subjects "if not sold as after-mentioned," to a certain series of heirs. The subjects were burdened with a bond for £2000. He then directed his trustees that should the holders of the bond "resolve to call up their money, and intimate such resolution prior to the expiry of twelve months from the death of the longest liver of my said wife and me," the property should be sold and the price divided, after payment of the bond, among a slightly different set of heirs. Prior to the death of the testator's widow a person who had right to one half of the bond gave notice to the trustees that he wished payment. The trustees arranged for payment to this creditor on his granting an assignment to another lender, and the property was not sold. Held that the calling up of a part of the bond was not in the circumstances the event contemplated by the testator, and that the trustees were not then bound to sell the property. Ibid.

Heritable or Moveable—Conversion.

8. A testator, whose estate consisted in nearly equal proportions of heritage and moveables, directed his trustees, after paying debts, &c., and certain small special legacies, "with regard to the residue of my means and estate," as soon after his death as possible, "to pay and convey the same" equally among his four children, the issue of children predeceasing the period of payment and conveyance to be entitled to their parent's share. In the event of a child's predecease without leaving issue that child's share was to accrete to the others and the issue of predeceasing. The deed then proceeded,—"To enable my trustees to carry out the purposes of this settlement . . . I confer upon them all requisite powers, . . . and particularly power to sell my heritable estate." The personal estate was sufficient to enable the trustees to pay all debts and special legacies. Held that by the terms of the settlement the estate was moveable quoad succession. Baird, &c. v. Watson, Dec. 8, 1880, p. 233.

Legacy to "nearest in kin"—Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, 18 Vict. c. 23, sec. 1.

9. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) that a legacy to a person's "nearest in kin" was not to be construed as a legacy to his heirs in mobilibus.

Question, whether a legacy to next of kin was to be construed as a legacy to nearest relations, or as a legacy to next of kin as defined by the law of moveable succession.

Observed, that the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, adopted the common law definition of next of kin. Young's Trustees v. Janes, &c., Dec. 10, 1880, p. 242.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Foreign—Destination—English entail of Scotch estate, effect of—Titles to Land Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), secs. 19 and 20—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 46.

10. An Englishman left a will in the English form by which, inter alia, he devised all such of his lands, &c., situate in the counties of Devon, of Inverness in Scotland, &c., as consisted of "freehold of inheritance," "to the use of my elder son, E. F. S., and his assigns, for his life, without impeachment of waste, and after the death of the said E. F. S. to the use of the first and every other son of the said E. F. S. successively, according to their respective seniorities, in tail male, with remainder to the use of," &c. It was admitted that this was a valid settlement "in tail male" of the English estates, according to the law of England. Under a subsequent clause E. F. S. took, as residuary devisee or legatee, all property not otherwise disposed of. He was also the testator's heir-at-law.

The testator left an estate in Inverness-shire held of a subject-superior. E. F. S. claimed this estate as conveyed to him absolutely by the above clause, the destination not being such as by the law of Scotland imported any restriction or limitation of his right, or, alternatively, as forming part of the residue, or as intestate succession. His claim was opposed on behalf of his pupil children.

The parties agreed, by minute, on an interpretation of the meaning and effect, according to the law of England, of the terms used by the testator in the above clause. According to this interpretation the Inverness-shire estate would have been a "freehold of inheritance" had it been situated in England, and the incidents of an English settlement in tail male following on a tenancy for life, as therein described, were, in the opinion of the majority of the Court, substantially the same as those of a Scotch conveyance in liferent allanarly and in fee, with a simple destination to the heirs-male of the body of the fiar, subject to this condition, that the fiar should take no disposable estate till the death of the liferenter. Held (diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill) (1) that under the Titles to Land Act, 1868, sec. 20, the testator's will was to receive effect according to its true import and effect with reference to heritable estate, to the same extent as with reference to moveable estate; (2) that that import and effect were ascertainable by means of the interpretation afforded by the parties, and could be carried out substantially, without inconsistency with the practice or with the policy of the law of Scotland, by giving the pursuer a liferent allanarly, and the heir-male of his body a fee (postponing vesting of the fee during the pursuer's life), with a destination over to the other substitutes; (3) that a registrable title, in accordance with such true intent and meaning, fell to be made up under the said Act and the Conveyancing Act, 1874; and (4) claim of E. F. S. repelled.

The Lord Justice-Clerk, in dissenting, held that the intention of the testator was to make an English entail of a Scotch property, that there was no equivalent in the land laws of Scotland for an English entail, and that to sustain the defender's contention would be to authorise land in Scotland to be held in a manner which the law of Scotland did not recognise.

Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, did not place bequests of land on the same footing as bequests of moveables, to be carried into effect according to the intention of the testator as gathered from his testamentary deed, a registrable title being made up, if necessary, by the execution of a conveyance or other deed in conformity with that intention, but merely made a bequest of lands (in words which would have been, prior to the passing of the Act, habile to convey moveables only) equivalent to a general disposition of lands, on which a title could be made up as upon a general disposition; that, therefore, conditions and qualifications must enter the record precisely as they were contained in the testamentary deed which was to be equivalent to a general disposition, and could have no effect, by reason of the testator's intention merely, if they were incompatible with the land laws of Scotland. Studd v. Studd, &c., Dec. 10, 1880, p. 249.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Fee and Liferent—Fee with protected Succession—Repugnancy.

11. A testator, on the narrative that he had acquired considerable means by his first wife, and that it was his wish to make an additional provision for his two children by her, directed his trustees to convey certain heritable property to his son by his first marriage, W B L, and, "to make my said daughter C B L equal thereto, I leave and bequeath to her the sum of £1000 sterling, which legacy shall be payable at the first term" that should happen six months after his decease.

The residue of his estate the testator directed to be liferented by his second wife, and on her death to be divided among his whole children, the shares to vest at his death, and, subject to a condition of survivorship, to be payable to sons at the age of twenty-five, but in the case of daughters to be settled on themselves in liferent allanarly and on the issue of their bodies in fee. In this provision as to residue there was inserted a direction that the special legacy of £1000 to C B L, the daughter of his first marriage, should "be held by the trustees for her sole behoof during her minority," and should, upon her attaining majority, "be settled or placed so as validly and effectually to provide to herself a liferent only thereof, and to the lawful issue of her body, equally among them, the fee thereof."

C B L survived her father, attaining majority, but died shortly after unmarried.

In a competition for the special legacy of £1000 bequeathed to her, held (by the Second Division after consultation with the Judges of the First Division) that it had vested in her in fee absolutely and was transmitted to her executor, the restriction to a liferent allanarly only taking effect in the event of her being married and dying leaving issue surviving her. Lindsay's Trustees v. Lindsay, &c., Dec. 14, 1880, p. 281.

Testamentary writing—Deed purporting to convey or bequeath land—Titles to Land Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 20.

12. There was found in the repositories of a deceased an informal holograph document in these terms:—"All furniture, books, and personal effects to A absolutely, and the free liferent use of all my other means and estate. After A's decease, the whole of the estates to turned into cash at the time my trustees deem most suitable for best realising, and proceeds safely invested for disbursing as under." There then followed certain pecuniary legacies and a bequest of residue, and a nomination of trustees "for carrying out the foregoing." Held that this document being conceived in terms applicable to the deceased's whole estate, heritable as well as moveable, and being a clear expression of his last will, and therefore sufficient to confer on the trustees named "a right to claim and receive" his moveable estate, was also by virtue of the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, equivalent to a general disposition in their favour of his heritable estate. Aim's Trustee v. Aim, &c., Dec. 15, 1880, p. 294.

Approbate and Reprobate—Casus improvisus—Clause of forfeiture—Repudiation by liferenter to exclusion of own issue.

13. A trust directed the residue of his estate to be held and retained by his trustees, who were to pay therefrom annual allowances to his children during their lives, and after their death to pay the capital, and any accumulations, to the lawful issue of his children, and, failing lawful issue of any of his children, then to the lawful issue of the survivors or survivor, equally among them per stirpes. He farther declared that any child repudiating the above provisions should forfeit for him or herself, and his or her issue, all right and interest under the settlement; and that the provisions made for the child or children so repudiating, and their issue, should pass to and be held for the child or children abiding by the settlement, and their issue.

The trustor's only surviving child who attained majority, a daughter,

SUCCESSION—Continued.

while still unmarried, repudiated the settlement. Held (1) that, having done so, she was not entitled to found on the declaration as to the forfeiture of the right and interest of her possible issue, to the effect of throwing the dead's part into intestacy, and herself taking as heir ab intestato; and (2) that as the clause of forfeiture was in favour of children who did not repudiate, and their issue, and as no such persons existed, the clause did not take effect, and that the residue must be retained by the trustees for behoof of any issue that might be born to the daughter. Gillies v. Gillies' Trustees, Feb. 23, 1881, p. 505.

Payment, acceleration of—Widow's repudiation of settlement.

14. A testator directed his trustees, in the event of his leaving no issue, to pay to his widow a free yearly annuity of £200, and give her the life interest use of a house, "and whatever further interest and annual income my said estates shall yield . . . shall be accumulated during the lifetime of my said wife by my said trustees, and form part of my estates." The estate yielded a clear return of more than £300 a-year, after paying the widow's annuity, which, in the event, which happened, of the trustee leaving no issue, was the only provision to be paid or provided for during her life. On her death the trustees were to pay to the children of J M "surviving at said period the sum of £100 each," and an annuity of £100 a-year to the brother of the trustee's widow, "provided he return to this country and reside here, and provided my said trustees consider that he requires the same." The residue was to form a fund to be vested in certain persons ex officio for the establishment of a charitable foundation, to be styled after the trustee "The Lucas Trust."

Held, on the widow's repudiation of the settlement, that the trustees and patrons of "The Lucas Trust" were entitled to an immediate conveyance of the residue, subject to existing and contingent interests. Lucas' Trustees v. The Trustees and Patrons of "The Lucas Trust," Feb. 18, 1881, p. 502.

Acceleration of distribution of residue.

15. The late Mr Thomas Elder, Edinburgh, died on 5th December 1869, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement for the following purposes, viz., first, payment of debts; second, payment of the provision in his marriage-contract in favour of his wife (being an annuity of £300); third and fourth, certain special legacies in favour of relations and charities, amounting to £5050; fifth, "that my trustees shall hold the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my estate remaining after fulfilment of the above written provisions, with the income arising therefrom, until the death of my wife, and shall out of such residue and income make payment of any other legacies or provisions I may leave by any writing to be hereafter signed by me expressive of my will although not formally executed; sixth, that my trustees shall, upon the death of my wife, set aside out of the residue of my estate the sum of £10,000, and shall either hold the same themselves or invest the same in the name of the general trustees for the time being of the Free Church of Scotland and their successors in office, or in the name of any other persons, as my trustees shall think best, in trust, to apply the free interest and profits accruing annually from the said sum, after deduction of all expenses, as a provision or endowment of a Professor of Natural Science in the said New College of Edinburgh in connection with the Free Church of Scotland;" seventh, upon the death of his wife to apply £7000 in building a territorial church, and £3000 as a partial endowment for the minister; and lastly, "after all the above purposes shall have been fulfilled, I appoint and direct my trustees to apply and pay over the whole residue and remainder of my estate, if such there shall be, to and for the use and benefit of such four of the Schemes of the Free Church of Scotland, and in such proportions as to my trustees shall appear most expedient." The residue of Mr Elder's estate as brought out in the residue account, after payment of legacies, but subject to his widow's annuity, amounted to £27,000. In a special case presented during the lifetime of the testator's widow the Court held that there was no reason why the express direction to the trustees to hold the residue and accumulations till the widow's death should not receive effect, and that the trustees were not entitled to make an immediate payment of the £10,000, even though the widow did not object. Elder's Trustees v. Treasurer of the Free Church of Scotland, &c., March 10, 1881, p. 593.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

"Lawful issue of her body," meaning of, when used in settlement of heritage.

16. The Court, without determining the general effect of the words "lawful issue of her body" occurring in a deed of settlement of heritage, held, in conformity with the opinion expressed in 1852 by Lord Rutherford, Ordinary (15 D. 176), and by Lord Wood in the Inner-House (15 D. 185), that in the particular deed the context shewed that they were to be construed as equivalent to "heirs of her body." Campbell v. Campbell, March 19, 1881, p. 694.

Testament—Holograph Will headed "Notes of intended Settlement."

17. In the repositories of a person who died leaving no other testamentary writing, the following holograph document was found bearing a date seven years before his death:—

"Bankhead, 19 June
1873

"Notes of intended settlement by Walter Whyte of Bankhead.

first—I liferent my wife Mrs. Margaret Pollok or Whyte, in my whole estate both Heritable & Moveable burdened with an Annuity of £300 Stg Three hundred pounds Sterling a year to," &c. After various bequests expressed in the same full and careful manner, the writer's signature was appended.

After a parole proof as to the circumstances, held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that the document was effectual as a testamentary writing of the deceased. Whyte v. Hamilton, &c., July 13, 1881, p. 940.

Vesting.

18. A testator, under the sixth purpose of his testament, bequeathed to his brothers Thomas and Alexander "the sum of £500 sterling each, payable at the first term . . . after the decease of my said spouse." By the residue-clause he appointed "the residue and remainder of my estate of every description, at the death of my said spouse, and including . . . any legacy that may have lapsed by the legatees predeceasing her, to be equally divided," &c. The legacies of £500 to his brothers Thomas and Alexander, who had survived the testator, but predeceased his widow, were the only legacies under the testament to which the above reference to lapse could apply.

Held that the legacies of £500 to the testator's brothers Thomas and Alexander vested in them a morte testatoris, in terms of the sixth purpose of the testament, and that the direction as to lapsed legacies in the residue-clause did not suspend vesting, but only provided for the possibility of lapse by reason of there being no one to take. Yeats v. Paton, &c., Nov. 27, 1881, p. 171.

Residuary Bequest—Condition.

19. A bequest of residue "to be equally divided among the children then alive of my brothers and sisters, equally per capita," contained the condition "but always secluding the eldest son of each family who may have succeeded to any heritable property of his father's." Held that this condition did not apply in the case of a brother or sister having only one child. Ibid.

See Entail, 4.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Non-entry—Proof of Superior's Title.

1. In 1821 a vassal entered with a superior. The lands were subsequently sold, and no other entry was asked by the superior until 1879, when an action was brought for payment of casualty against a singular successor of the vassal in question. It was not stated when the latter died. Held that the defender was liable unless he could shew that the superiority belonged to some one other than the representative of the superior with whom the previous entry had been made. Earl of Breadalbane v. Macdougall, Nov. 4, 1880, p. 42.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Payment of feu-duty—Claim by original vassal to assignation of superior's rights against insolvent disponees of former.

2. Held (diss. Lord Shand) that a vassal in tendering payment of his feu-duty is not entitled to require from his superior an assignation of his rights to enable him (the vassal) to recover the proportion of feu-duty applicable to part of the feu he had disposed, although the assignation were qualified with a declaration that it should not prejudice the rights of the superior. Guthrie and McConnachy v. Smith, Nov. 19, 1880, p. 107.

Composition—Debitum fundi.

3. Held that a composition due to a superior on the death of a vassal, where the entry is taxed by the feu-contract, is a debitum fundi, and not merely a personal debt of the succeeding vassal. Stewart v. Gibson's Trustee, Dec. 10, 1880, p. 270.

Relief—Claim of relief for composition by purchaser against seller—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (Stat. 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 4—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (Stat. 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 8.

4. A proprietor of lands entered with the superior in virtue of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and liable to the superior for a casualty of composition, sold the subjects, and executed a disposition binding himself to relieve the purchaser of all casualties payable to the superior prior to the date of entry. The purchaser took infeftment on the disposition, and the superior obtained decree against him for payment of the composition.

In an action brought by the purchaser against the seller for relief, held by the Second Division and four consulted Judges, rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill, (1) that at the date of the sale the seller was bound to clear the subjects of liability for the casualty then exigible; and (2) that the purchaser, by accepting the disposition and recording the same, had not barred himself from enforcing the obligation of relief.

Question, whether, apart from the obligation in the disposition, the seller would have been bound to relieve the purchaser. Straiton Estate Co. (Limited) v. Stephens, Dec. 16, 1880, p. 299.

Relief—Expenses.

5. A superior obtained decree for payment of composition due by a vassal against the latter's singular successor, who, after notice, had defended the action. The singular successor, having been found entitled to relief from the vassal of the casualty, was held to be entitled also to the expense of his unsuccessful defence. Ibid.

Composition—Unlet shootings to be included in casualty—Stat. 1469, c. 36.

6. When shootings are of such value that they might bring a rent if let, their value must be taken into account in computing the "year's mail as the land is set for the time," payable as a composition on the entry of a vassal under the Act 1496, c. 36. Stewart v. Bulloch, Jan. 14, 1881, p. 381.

Obligation to relieve of stipend—Right of redemption, whether open to superior as well as to vassal.

7. Certain lands and teinds were disposed in 1673, the superior undertaking to relieve the vassal of bypast burdens, "and yearly and tearmly in all time comeing, of all teynd-duty, minister's stipends, and annuity of teyns allenary." The superior further bound himself "that in case the teind sheaves of the said lands, with the crofts and pertinents thereof, or any part or portion of the said teinds, should be evicted from them, or that the same lands and teinds be burdened and affected with any minister's stipend in time coming, whether present or supervenient, then and in that case, and immediately after the said eviction or burdening of the said lands and teind, as said is, to content and pay to the said Andrew Ross and his fore-saids, in liferent and fee respective, the sum of £1200 Scots money for each chalder that should be so evicted, whether of stock or teind, with the annualrent of the said sums, yearly and termly during the not-payment thereof after the said eviction."

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Held that by the terms of these clauses the option of fixing the mode of relief by redemption or by an annual payment was conferred on the vassal, and not on the superior.

Observed that a right of redemption is res meræ facultatis, which no prescription can take away. Reid's Trustees v. Duchess of Sutherland, Feb. 25, 1881, p. 509.

Feuar bound to make a road in front of his feu when road is made through adjoining ground is not bound to make the road by becoming proprietor of the adjoining ground.

8. In August 1863 a proprietor feued a piece of ground (part of the estate of D), bounded on the north by a proposed road, on the east by the adjoining estate of K, belonging to a different proprietor, which lay between D and the city of Glasgow, subject to the condition that, in the event (which was then improbable) of a street being formed through K in connection with the proposed road, the feuar should be bound to form and maintain one-half of the said road in front of his feu.

In February 1864 the feuar, to take advantage of a wall which had been built by the proprietor of K four and a half feet within his boundary, bought from him the strip of ground lying between his feu and the wall, extending northwards from the south-east corner of the feu, the whole length of the feu and twice that distance beyond.

In 1872 the proprietor of D bought a part of the estate of K, which would have enabled him to form a street through K in connection with the proposed road, had it not been for the intervening strip acquired by the feuar.

In an action brought by the proprietor of D, against the feuar, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that the defender was bound to form a road forty feet wide over the strip, upon payment of such compensation as the Court should fix, held by seven Judges that the defender was under no obligation, express or implied, to make, or allow to be made, a road over the part of K acquired by him. Paterson v. M'Ewan's Trustees, March 18, 1881, p. 646.

Condition in favour of superior—Vassal not to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors—Property.

9. In the middle of the last century the proprietor of a large estate commenced to feu ground for building at a particular part of the estate, where in course of time a considerable town sprang up. In the titles of all the feuars was inserted as a real burden the condition that it should not be lawful for the vassals "to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors, or to keep victualling or eating-houses" on the subjects, "unless they shall obtain permission in writing to that effect from the superior."

This prohibition was not enforced in any case from the commencement of the feuing down to 1880, and a number of licensed houses of different kinds were opened in the town. In 1880 the superior, having given some months notice to the vassals, proceeded to enforce the prohibition by action of declarator and interdict. His object was the furtherance of his views for the social reform of the district. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that the superior was not entitled to enforce the prohibition, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill being of opinion (with the Lord Ordinary) that he had no interest to do so which the law would recognise, and Lord Young, that the prohibition was repugnant to the absolute right of property conferred on a vassal by the nature of his feu-right. Earl of Zetland v. Hislop, March 18, 1881, p. 675.

Sub-vassal—Feu-duty—Liability of Sub-vassal to Over-superior.

10. Held that an over-superior has not a direct personal action for the whole cumulo feu-duty against a sub-vassal holding part of the feu.

Opinion, per cur., that the over-superior is entitled to enforce for his own benefit the obligations come under by the sub-vassal to his own immediate superior. Sandeman v. Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society, Limited, June 8, 1881, p. 790.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Non-entry—Proof of superior's title.

11. In 1821 A entered with B as his superior in the lands of S. A's predecessors had entered in the same way with B's predecessors in 1740 and 1795. The lands of S were subsequently sold, but no entry was asked by B or his successors from 1821 down to 1879, when B's successor brought an action for payment of casualty against a singular successor of A. The defender maintained that there was no evidence to establish the identity of the lands of S possessed by him with the lands of which the pursuer held the superiority, and that his lands of S really held of another subject-superior. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that as the defender had failed to prove that the superiority of his lands of S belonged to some one other than the representative of the superior with whom the previous entries had been made he was liable in the casualty. Macdougall v. Earl of Breadalbane, May 17, 1881, H. L., p. 92.

TACIT RELOCATION. See Master and Servant.

TEINDS. Process—Citation—A. S., July 5, 1809.—A rectified scheme of the locality of St Cuthbert's parish, Edinburgh, having been approved as final, the Lord Ordinary approved of the Auditor's report, and decerned for expenses. After extract had been issued it was discovered by the teind-clerk that certain lands belonging to the city of Edinburgh had been entered and localled upon twice under different classifications. The Lord Provost and Magistrates, when this error was discovered, prepared a summons of reduction of the said final decree of locality, and, as preliminary to raising the action, petitioned the Court to dispense with the ordinary mode of citation of the heritors of the parish (1075 in number), on the ground of expense, and instead thereof to allow citation by means of notice given in the kirk by the precentor, written notice on the kirk door, and subsequent newspaper advertisements in the manner prescribed by the Act of Sederunt, July 5, 1809, for the raising of actions of augmentation. The expenses of citation in the ordinary way were estimated at about £250, besides agent's fees and other expenses. The Court, in the circumstances, granted the prayer of the petition. Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh (Locality of St Cuthbert's), July 18, 1881, p. 982.

TITLE TO SUE. Effect of "consent and concurrence."

Where the principal party to a suit has an interest or right of his own, but so qualified by or dependent upon some jus tertii or some limitation or condition that he has no title to sue separately, his defect of title may be cured by the "consent and concurrence" of the person by or on whose right his is qualified or dependent. But when the principal party to a suit has no interest or right of his own, his defect of title cannot be cured by the "consent and concurrence" of the person to whom alone the right of action truly belongs.

Where a feuar of building ground had no title to enforce a restriction in the feu-contract of a neighbouring feuar, held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the "consent and concurrence of the superior" did not obviate the objection to his title to sue. Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, June 23, 1881, H.L., p. 95.

See Husband and Wife, 2.

TRADING, EXCLUSIVE. Nobile officium—Stat. 9 and 10 Vict. (Exclusive Trading in Burghs Act, 1846), cap. 17, secs. 1, 2, and 3—Application of funds of incorporation nearly extinct—Procedure.

An ancient Incorporation of Masons and Wrights in a burgh, which had formerly the privilege of exclusive trading, having become almost extinct, a petition was presented to the Court, under the 3d section of the Exclusive Trading in Burghs Act, 1846, to have certain resolutions as to the future application of the funds approved of. The Court remitted the resolutions to the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and upon his report approved of the resolutions as amended by him.

TRADING, EXCLUSIVE—Continued.

Resolutions approved of by the Court in the above circumstances. The United Incorporation of Masons and Wrights of Haddington, July 20, 1881, p. 1029.

TRUST. Liability of trustees—Discretion as to investment—Bank stock—Severing of interests of beneficiaries—Whether trustees' relief thereby affected.

1. A testatrix directed her trustees, by the second purpose of her trust-deed, to pay to her daughter A "the interest or annualrent of £2000" during her life, and on her death to pay the fee of that sum to her children. By the third purpose of her trust-deed she made a similar provision for her daughter B in liferent and her children in fee; and she directed her trustees, after making provision for the payment of these legacies, to divide the residue of her estate. Power was conferred on the trustees "to continue to hold any or all of such shares or stocks in public or other companies as may pertain and belong to me at the time of my decease, should they consider it advisable or expedient to do so," without any personal responsibility for loss, if any, thereby sustained; and power also "to lend or place out on such security or securities, heritable or moveable, as they shall consider advantageous, the foresaid legacies of £2000 and £2000 respectively, the said security or securities to be conceived in favour of my trustees, and that for the purposes of this trust, and not otherwise."

The trustees allocated various stocks belonging to the testatrix and sums of money to meet the legacies of £2000 to A and B respectively, and though the various investments stood without distinction in the names of the trustees, separate accounts were kept and regularly rendered to A and B respectively of the profits arising from the investments allocated to her, and of the expenses connected therewith. The residue was then divided. Among the stocks belonging to the testatrix was certain stock of the City of Glasgow Bank. A portion of this was realised, but the rest was on the request of B retained by the trustees as an investment of part of the legacy to her and her family. The City of Glasgow Bank afterwards suspended payment, and, being an unlimited company, the trustees were subjected to heavy calls. They claimed relief out of the trust-estate generally, which then consisted only of funds held for behoof of A and B and their respective families.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that while the trustees were under the trust-deed empowered to retain the City of Glasgow Bank stock, being stock held by the truster, not only till the residue was realised and divided, but also as an investment of the special legacies bequeathed to A and B and their families, that having appropriated certain investments for behoof of A and her family, they must be regarded as holding the same in trust for their behoof exclusively, and were not entitled to relief therefrom for liability arising from investments held for B and her family.

Observed that the liability incurred by the trustees in respect of the calls on the City of Glasgow Bank stock was in no sense a debt of the truster. Robinson v. Fraser's Trustee, August 3, 1881, H. L., p. 127.

Power to grant leases—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 97), sec. 3.

2. Section 3 of the above Act empowers the Court to grant authority to trustees to grant long leases of the estate under their management "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof." A trust-deed directed that after the death of the truster's widow (who was to have a liferent of the whole estate), the trustees were to enter into possession of the whole lands thereby disposed, and to divide and pay over the proceeds half-yearly among his children as an alimentary provision, and, upon the death of the last survivor of the said children, to sell and dispose of the whole lands so conveyed, and to divide the proceeds among his grandchildren then alive. The trustees, during the life of the truster's widow, presented a petition to the Court for leave to grant a lease of part of the said subjects for 999 years, the expediency of which course was beyond dispute. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) held that the proposed lease was not contrary to the truster's intention as expressed in the trust-deed, and granted authority as craved. Birkmyre, &c., Feb. 5, 1881, p. 477.

TRUST—Continued.

Assumption of new trustees.

3. In a trust which consisted of three trustees, two of them, as a quorum, executed a deed of assumption of two additional trustees without giving any notice to their co-trustee. Held that the deed of assumption was invalid. Wyse v. Abbott, &c., July 19, 1881, p. 983.

Separation of funds jointly administered.

4. Prior to 1695 the magistrates of a burgh held a fund as trustees for a hospital for poor and sick. In that year a person of the name of Alexander conveyed to the hospital two heritable bonds for sums amounting to £2270, stating that the revenue thereof was to be applied in supporting a certain number of pensioners in the hospital, and directing that any surplus revenue should be applied to increase the capital. He further directed that the patrons of the mortification (the magistrates and the ministers of the burgh) should prefer as beneficiaries (1) his own kindred, (2) those of the name of Alexander, and, failing these, should select beneficiaries. In 1696 the magistrates, as trustees of the hospital, obtained possession of the bonds, and subsequently, disregarding the special directions as to the application of the revenue, administered it along with the general revenue of the hospital, keeping no separate account of the two funds.

In 1734 the magistrates expended £4634 of the hospital funds in the purchase of lands. In 1744 and 1753 the two Alexander bonds were paid up and the funds mixed with the hospital funds. The whole funds not invested in land were subsequently lent by the magistrates to the burgh, which became bankrupt, and its debts were, by statute, converted into three per cent annuities.

In a question raised in 1873 as to the amount of the Alexander fund held (aff. judgment of First Division) (1) that since the year 1700 the said fund had been immixed with and dealt with as part of the funds of the hospital, and must be held to have participated proportionally with the hospital funds in the increase of value of the aggregate funds and property between the years 1700 and 1873; and that the purchase of lands in 1734 was to be regarded as a purchase on account of the joint funds, although the original Alexander bonds were not paid until a subsequent date. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Maclaren, August 3, 1881, H. L., p. 140.

Ex officio Trustees.

5. Held that the fact of the ministers of a burgh, who were named along with others as trustees for a charity, taking no part in the management of the trust for upwards of a century, was no bar to their successors exercising their rights. Ibid.

See Entail, 6—Judicial Factor, 2.

TUTOR. See Minor and Pupil.

TUTOR-DATIVE. See Judicial Factor, 3.

VESTING. See Succession, 6, 18.

WINDING UP. See Public Company, 2, 3—Friendly Society—Trading, Exclusive.

WRIT. Holograph writing regarding heritage—Agreement between landlord and tenant written by factor to landlord's dictation.

Where a proposed additional agreement between a landlord and tenant was dictated by the landlord to his factor in the tenant's presence and handed to the tenant unsigned, and subsequently accepted by the tenant in writing, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the writings did not constitute a completed contract, the first writing being neither holograph of the landlord nor the writ of his factor, and that the tenant was therefore entitled to reside.

WRIT—Continued.

Sinclair v. Caithness Flagstone Quarrying Co., April 7, 1881, H. L., p. 78.

WRIT, BLANK. See Cautioner.

CASES DECIDED IN THE REGISTRATION APPEAL COURT.

Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1832, sec. 9, and schedule G—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 6—Tenant and Occupant—Entry in Register—Necessity for statement of occupancy on the Roll.

1. Held that "tenant" is a sufficient entry in the qualification column of the register of voters, without the addition of the words "and occupant," even in cases where "actual personal occupancy" is essential to the qualification.
Kennedy v. Alexander, Nov. 8, 1880, p. 1.

Qualification—Beneficiary—Trust—Heritable or Moveable.

2. A and his two sisters were the sole surviving beneficiaries under a trust-deed and settlement conveying property both heritable and moveable, the value of the heritable estate being £76 per annum, subject to a feu-duty of £5 per annum, and the amount of the moveable estate £1300. The trustees, of whom A was one, were infest in the property. Under the trust-deed one-fifth of the whole estate was to be paid over to A, and he was likewise to receive the income of other shares as they fell in. At the date of this case he was entitled to and received seven-fifteenths of the income of the whole estate. The trust-deed contained a power of sale, which had not been exercised. An objection to A's right to be placed on the roll of voters as joint proprietor of the heritable property, on the ground that his right was moveable and not heritable, repelled.
Anderson v. Niven, Nov. 8, 1880, p. 4.

Claim—Signature of claim by claimant's agent—Necessity for written mandate—Proof of agent's employment.

3. Held that a claim may be signed for a claimant by his agent, and that no written mandate is required provided there be sufficient proof aliunde that the agent has the requisite authority.
Rutherford v. Lockie, Nov. 13, 1880, p. 6.

Valuation-roll—Proof aliunde of value—Claimant impugning valuation-roll of preceding year.

4. The value of certain heritable subjects was entered in the valuation-roll 1879–80 at £10, and in the roll 1880–81 at £20. It was admitted that the entry in the roll of 1879–80 should have been £20. Held that the tenant was entitled to the franchise.

Question, whether the valuation-roll of 1880–81 was not in itself conclusive on the question of value.
Stevenson v. Miller, Nov. 13, 1880, p. 8.

Process—No appearance for respondent in an appeal.

5. The Court will not sustain an appeal in respect of no appearance for the respondent, but will require the appellant to shew cause why the Sheriff's judgment should be altered.
Aitken v. Robertson, Nov. 13, 1880, p. 12.

Title to object—Person on assessor's list—Altered qualification.

6. A voter stood on the register for the year 1879–80 as "tenant and occupant." He lost that qualification and at the same time became qualified as "proprietor." The assessor placed him on the list of persons having lost their qualifications, and placed him on the list of persons having become entitled to vote. Held that he was entitled to object to the name of a person being entered on the register. Ibid.

REGISTRATION CASES—Continued.

Joint Tenant—Constructive occupancy—Woodyard.

7. William Lunan and Peter R. Lunan, sole partners of the firm of William Lunan & Co., were joint tenants of a woodyard at Borrowstounness of the annual value of £32. Neither of them resided within the county of Linlithgow, in which the subjects were situated. There was no house on the property, but the woodyard was used for storing wood belonging to the firm. The business was carried on by the servants of the firm.

Held that the partners of the firm were in the actual personal occupancy of the subjects within the meaning of the statute, and were entitled to be registered thereon. Lunan v. Allan, Nov. 13, 1880, p. 13.

Stanford Law Library

3 6105 062 686 816

Standard Law Library

3 6105 062 686 816

